V. 16—18. It is generally thought, that the ark of the covenant was not found after the captivity, and that nothing was substituted in its place: yet vastly more than this must be here intended. The ark was the chief symbol of the Lord's presence with Israel, the principal type of Christ, and the centre of the ritual law. The meaning therefore seems to be, that the whole of that dispensation was about to be abolished, which took place after the multitude of believers had been greatly increased, by the conversion of the Gentiles, and of the Israelites scattered among them. The strong attachment of the Jews to externals, and their reluctance to part with them, seem to be denoted. They could not be weaned from these beggarly elements, till Jerusalem and the temple were destroyed; then the observance of them became impracticable, and the Jewish converts to Christ perceived that they were no longer of any value; and thus they sunk into disuse, and gradually into oblivion. At the same time the Church, the Jerusalem from above, became more glorious: the Lord openly reigned there as on his throne: all the nations were gathered before him to worship, and no longer followed the imaginations of their own evil hearts, in the worship of idols. In this happy state of the Church, it is predicted that the Jews and Israelites would lay aside their ancient contests, cordially unite in the worship of God, and enjoy together the peculiar privileges of his people. As this is here introduced subsequent to the calling of the Gentiles, it seems to foretell the future calling of the tribes of Israel into the Church, and their restoration to their own land. (Marg. Ref.)—'Whatever way we understand these promises, about the 'restoration of the Jews from captivity or dispersion, it 'cannot annul the evidence of the chief predictions in 'view; viz. those relating to the abolishing of the cere'monial law, and the conversion of the Gentiles; begun 'by the calling or gathering in of many nations, and com'pleted, by "the gathering of all nations to the name of "the LORD." (Maclaurin.)

V. 19. The blessings, promised in the preceding verses, were exceedingly great; and a difficulty, apparently insurmountable, lay in the way of their accomplishment, arising from the guilt of the nation: for how could JEHOVAH, consistently with his justice and holiness, put such obstinate rebels among his children, and give them that pleasant land for their inheritance, which had been long possessed as an heritage by the nations and their armies? To this he answers, that he would bring them to repentance, faith, and prayer, and give them the Spirit of adoption, the temper of dutiful children; and then they would call on him and fear him, and love him as their Father: and that he would so influence their hearts by his grace, that they should no more depart from him: and it is implied, that when this took place, he would cast out their enemies before them, as he had done when their fathers were first put in possession of Canaan. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 20—25. This seems to be a prophetical representation of the manner in which the change before mentioned should be effected. The Lord would convince the people of their wickedness, in treacherously departing from him. Then the voice of their lamentations and prayers would be heard, even in the places where their crimes had been perpetrated: and this open confession was necessary, as they had so perversely forsaken the way of obedience, and forgotten their God. He then graciously invites them to return to him, and he will both pardon their guilt and heal their backslidings; establishing their hearts by his sanctifying grace. Thus encouraged, they readily declare their purpose of immediately returning to the Lord, who had a right to their worship and service. They are now

Israel and Judah are called to repent, with gracious promises and solemn warnings, 1—4. A prediction of the invasion of Judah and the ravages of war, for the wickedness and hypocrisy of the inhabitants, 5—18. The prophet bitterly laments the sins and miseries of his people, 19—31.

convinced that salvation, temporal or eternal, must be sought in vain from their idols or superstitions, and that it could only be had from the Lord. They confess, that, for their sins, they had endured much disgrace and misery, having been spoiled of their property and bereaved of their children: they are now ashamed before God to reflect on their iniquities and idolatries and those of their fathers, through all their generations; and being thus penitent, they are reinstated in the family of God, and numbered among his children. (Notes, Isaiah lxiii. lxiv.) Some expositors consider the word shame, as exclusively relating to the shameful idolatries of Israel; especially the worship of Baal; for this idol is sometimes called Bosheth, the word rendered shame; but this interpretation is not necessary: the present dispersed and disgraced state of the nation is evidently the punishment of crimes, entirely distinct from gross idolatry, from which the Jews have long been free; and their recovery from this abject condition seems especially predicted.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

The Lord is so rich in mercy, and hath made such abundant provision for the honourable exercise of it, that he is ever ready to receive to full favour the vilest of sinners: even when it would be contrary to the most approved rules of society, exactly to copy his example in our conduct to those who grossly violate their relative obligations. But whilst he glorifies the abundance of his grace, in calling rebels or apostates to return unto him, he will also bring their iniquities to remembrance; nor can any man expect the tokens of his favour, who is not humbled and ashamed on account of his transgressions. If then we would escape rebukes, corrections, or ruinous judgments, we must judge ourselves, and examine with minute exactness all the sins we remember to have committed, that we may condemn ourselves for them before God. In this frame of mind, the vilest transgressor may approach him as a kind Father, and may plead with him all the favours that he hath bestowed, as the Creator and Preserver of men. All the mercies of God to his Church in every age may suggest encouragement to the humble inquirer: and what can be so desirable for the young and inexperienced, in this ensnaring perilous world, as to have the Lord for their Father, and the Guide of their youth? Let such then daily and fervently pray for this mercy: and let parents direct and help their children in seeking it, and earnestly entreating God to bestow it on them. Let those, who have not hitherto begun to seek the Lord, from this time begin to do it in good earnest; and if any have grown negligent in this important concern, let them without delay and with their whole heart return unto the Lord. But it will not avail the obstinate and hypocritical, to use the most excellent words, and to presume upon their external privileges, and relation to God; or on his mercy, as if he would not execute his threatened vengeance, especially on those who call him Lord and Father, but who continue to speak and do evil as they can. Alas! how plainly do we find, on an impartial review of our conduct, that we have had it in our hearts to do far more evil, than we had it in our power actually to perpetrate; and that we should have made ourselves far more vile, if we had had more liberty, health, riches, ingenuity, or opportunity; or if we could have got over the fear of reproach or punishment from man! And how few temptations, comparatively, have we resisted out of pure regard to God! When we carefully mark the crimes of others, especially of such as break off from a religious profession, and despise warnings and convictions, we should also note the consequences: and then we shall generally see abundant reason to shun their evil ways. But when the Lord makes sinners a warning and beacon to their companions; and they fear not, but rush into similar iniquities, their guilt is greatly aggravated. He is the only competent Judge of characters; he knows perfectly how to estimate men's comparative advantages, with the warnings and the strivings of his Spirit which they resist; the hypocrisy of their apparent good, and many other discriminating circumstances: and he alone can infallibly determine, whether the open infidel and profligate, or the designing hypocrite be the viler character. It is dreadful to be proved more criminal than those who have actually perished in their sins; yet it will be no comfort to the condemned to know, that some others were still worse than they.

V. 12—25.

Blessed be God, his word hath been proclaimed in this our distant land, calling on sinners to return unto him, and declaring his plenteous mercy, and readiness to forgive.—This goodness of our God should lead us to repentance, and humble confession of our sins. But, alas! most men, after the hardness of their impenitent hearts, despise the riches of his mercy, and proceed to treasure up wrath against the day of wrath. Hitherto only a small remnant hath been called into the true Church of God, even from that nation which was as it were married to him; and but few of this our nation, that hath been almost equally favoured. But let us be thankful, if we are of this number: and let ministers pray for themselves, and let the people pray for them, that they may be pastors after God's own heart, to feed the people with knowledge and understanding: and that very many such pastors may be raised up in all parts of the world. In the primitive ages of the Church, when the partition-wall was taken down, such pastors abounded, and the number of true Israelites was vastly increased; but "yet there is room:" the holy nation may still be multiplied exceedingly, its worship may be rendered more spiritual, its people more weaned from the imaginations of their evil hearts; and they may be taught to be more of one heart and soul, and "to keep the unity of "the Spirit in the bond of peace." Then Jerusalem will appear to be the glorious throne of JEHOVAH; Israel and Judah will become one in Christ Jesus, and all nations will be gathered unto him. We are ready sometimes, on considering the character of hardened sinners, to say, how can the Lord put such persons among his children, and give them those privileges and that inheritance which belong to every one of his family? But surely the mercy and grace, which have sufficed for us, would suffice for the vilest that we know or can conceive of. He can teach all the nations of the earth to call him Father, and to exercise every filial disposition towards him; but without this change, no man can be partaker of the inheritance of the children of God: and we can have no security that we shall not depart from him, except as he engages to keep us. But whilst professed Christians often treacherously depart from God, the voice of godly sorrow and prayer is sometimes heard from the most wicked: they have indeed perverted their ways, and forgotten the Lord, and they humbly confess it: and even the back-sliding children can only be known from apostates, when they thus humbly return to him. Let such then without delay come unto the God of Israel for salvation, that their backslidings may be healed. Sincere penitents renounce all other hopes of salvation, as well as their idols and iniquities. Whilst men harden themselves in sin, contempt and misery are their portion: but when they are covered with shame and confusion before God, they enter upon safety, comfort, and honour: for "he that "covereth his sins shall not prosper, but he that confesseth and forsaketh them shall find mercy."

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1. 2. These verses seem to be addressed to the ten tribes, and to continue the subject of the preceding chapter. They had been introduced, saying, "Behold we come unto thee, for thou art the LORD our "God:" and here they are reminded to return wholly and in good earnest to him and his service; and not to rest in a partial or superficial reformation: and the Lord assures them that if they evidenced their sincerity by putting away all their abominable idolatries and iniquities which they had wrought as in his sight, they should be re-established in their ancient inheritance, and not remove from it any more, or wander about as they had done. This was a clear intimation to Judah also, by what means their removal might be prevented. Thus they would become serious and devout in their religious worship; and they would use the name of the living God, and not that of an idol, in their solemn oaths; in sincerity, and with reverence and consideration, and not in a trifling manner or on frivolous occasions; and they would punctually observe their oaths, "in truth, judgment, and righteousness." Then other nations, seeing their holiness and prosperity, would be induced to seek happiness from God, and to glory in him as their Portion and Salvation; and thus his name would be glorified, which had been dishonoured by the crimes and calamities of his professed worshippers. This implies a prediction of the conjunction of the Israelites and the Gentiles in the Christian Church. The constant mention of swearing, as an act and a part of true religious worship, which in some cases is expressly commanded, constitutes a full proof, that they who understand certain passages in the New Testament, as indiscriminately prohibiting all oaths, in every case, lie under a mistake: for God could never have commanded that which is directly evil in its very nature, as all oaths by such an interpretation are supposed to be.

V. 3, 4. The Jews are here addressed. They were still continued in the land, and favoured with the ordinances of God: their pious king, (assisted by the prophets and others,) was sedulously employed in extirpating idolatry, and in promoting religion and righteousness; but the people were generally hypocritical in their concurrence; their hearts continued proud, hard, stout, and carnal, producing spontaneously vice and impiety, but incapable of receiving the good seed of divine instruction. It was therefore incumbent on them, and absolutely necessary, earnestly to use all means of preparing their hearts for the good seed of divine truth, together with diligence and self-denial in mortifying their worldly lusts; that they might receive the good seed into a humble, teachable, contrite and upright heart, by faith and in love; and so bring forth the fruit of it in a holy life. They were indeed disposed to confide and glory in circumcision, as a token of their relation to God. But this would not profit them, unless their hearts were circumcised, by the mortification of their depraved propensities, that they might love God and his holy ways: and except this inward circumcision, and the consequent dedication of themselves to his service took place, no external privileges or reformation could prevent the execution of the predicted judgments on them; for the wrath of God for their personal and national sins would break forth, and burn like fire that could not be quenched. This preparation of heart is indeed the gift of God, and is frequently promised in Scripture: yet it is the sinner's duty to repent, to submit, to fear God, to believe his word, to turn to him, to love and to serve him: and therefore these things are frequently and expressly commanded. Nor is it any proof of wisdom, to aim at more exact systematical consistency, than this twofold scriptural view of the subject exhibits. The word rendered fore-skins, is translated by the Septuagint hardness of heart, which gives the proper meaning, though not the literal sense, of the passage.

V. 5—7. Even during Josiah's reformation, the prophet was commissioned to predict the invasion of the land by Nebuchadnezzar, which took place above thirty years after. The alarm is given, as by one upon the spot; it is ordered to be published by the blowing of the trumpet; and the people are called upon to assemble, and take refuge in their strong-holds. The standard was to be erected in the way to Zion, that the people might without delay repair thither for safety; and yet this would be in vain, for destruction was at hand. For Nebuchadnezzar, the conqueror and destroyer of the neighbouring nations, was risen up, as a fierce lion from the thicket, to go in quest of his prey; and had left Babylon, commissioned by God, to desolate the land and the cities of Judah.

V. 9. 'Great calamities often deprive men of their 'wonted courage, and that presence of mind which is ne- 'cessary for the due management of their affairs: and 'sometimes a divine infatuation accompanies God's other 'judgments.' 'The priests and false prophets agreed to 'make the people believe that none of these calamities 'should come upon them.' (Lowth.)

V. 10. In the prospect of these calamities, the prophet was astonished and afflicted to see the people secure, and seduced into a vain expectation of peace and prosperity, by means of the false prophets. This the Lord permitted and appointed in judgment, to punish their contempt of him; and the prophet lamented it, as the most awful of their calamities. For they expected peace, whilst the indignation of the Lord reached even to the soul, and inflicted a mortal wound. 'These pretenders to prophecy study only 'to speak pleasing things to the people, and to soothe 'them in their impenitency and carnal security; and thou 'hast in thy just judgment given them up to follow these 'delusions.' (Lowth.) 'Then said I, Ah, Lord GOD, 'surely this people and Jerusalem will be ready to cast 'upon thee the imputation of deceiving them; in that 'those who have pretended to prophecy unto them, have 'said, Ye shall have peace, whereas there is nothing but 'slaughter and devastation.' (Bp. Hall.) 'Thou hast 'punished their stubbornness, by causing them to hearken 'unto lies, who would not believe thy truth.' (Notes, 1 Kings xxii. 19—23. 2 Thes. ii. 10—12.)

V. 11—13. The approach of the invaders is here represented by striking similitudes. It would be as a dry wind, increasing drought and famine, bringing suffocating heat, and occasioning fatal diseases, and sometimes overwhelming travellers with immense quantities of burning sands, as they passed through the deserts. It would blow from the high places in the wilderness, towards Zion. It was not intended to correct and purify the people, as the gentle gale fans and cleanses the corn, but as a full wind to drive all away together: and it would come, "unto me," either to the Lord's sanctuary, who seems here to speak, and at his command, or to the habitation of the prophet by whom he spake: for God would speedily denounce sentence against Zion as a condemned criminal; to execute which Nebuchadnezzar and his armies would come swiftly and in immense multitudes, so that nothing could stop their progress; as clouds speedily formed darken the sky, and burst forth in a dreadful storm. Thus his chariots would be like a whirlwind, to desolate the land.

16 Make [n] ye mention to the nations; behold, publish against Jerusalem, [o] that watchers come [p] from a far country, [q] and give out their voice against the cities of Judah.

17 As [r] keepers of a field, are they against her round about; [s] because she hath been rebellious against me, saith the LORD.

18 Thy way and [t] thy doings have procured these things unto thee; this is thy wickedness, because it is bitter, [u] because it reacheth unto thine heart.

19 ¶ My bowels, [x] my bowels! I am pained at * my very heart; my heart maketh a noise in me; I cannot hold my peace, [y] because thou hast heard, O my soul, the sound of the trumpet, the alarm of war.

20 [z] Destruction upon destruction is cried; for the whole land is spoiled: [a] suddenly are my tents spoiled, and my curtains in a moment.

21 How [b] long shall I see the standard, and hear the sound of the trumpet?

22 For [c] my people is foolish, they have not known me; they are sottish children, and they have none understanding: [d] they are wise to do evil, but to do good they have no knowledge.

23 I [e] beheld the earth, and, lo, it was without form and void; [f] and the heavens, and they had no light.

24 I beheld the [g] mountains, and, lo, they trembled, and all the hills moved lightly.

25 I beheld, and, lo, [h] there was no man, and all the birds of the heavens were fled.

26 I beheld, and, lo, [i] the fruitful place was a wilderness, and all the cities thereof were broken down at the presence of the LORD, and by his fierce anger.

27 For thus hath the LORD said, [k] The whole land shall be desolate; [l] yet will I not make a full end.

28 For this shall [m] the earth mourn, and [n] the heavens above be black:

V. 14. Some attention had been paid by the Jews to external reformation; but the heart of Jerusalem, or of its inhabitants, was still polluted, and the seat of idolatry and wickedness: vain imaginations, desires, and affections, not only obtained admission, but lodged therein as welcome guests; the people still harboured with pleasure the thoughts of returning to their idols and iniquities: and vainly imagined they should be safe and happy in their evil ways, and in their carnal and presumptuous confidences in the Egyptians and on their religious privileges. (Marg. Ref.) This had long been the case, and the prophet inquired, how long they intended that it should be so? For it was absolutely necessary that their hearts should be washed, in the exercise of true repentance and faith, from the love and pollution of sin; or no external ablutions and purifications could save their city from desolation, or their souls from hell.

V. 15—18. The prophet, in vision, beholds the invaders entering the northern border of the land; and the report spreads swiftly from Dan, through the nations that inhabited Ephraim: but their design was especially against Jerusalem and Judah; they came from a far country to besiege their cities and to watch around them, that no relief should be brought in, and no inhabitants escape out; as men are set to guard the field, and keep the cattle from getting out, or the robbers from breaking in. Thus the sword of the enemy, or the vengeance of the Lord, would pierce their vitals, to punish their atrocious rebellions.

V. 19—27. The prophet, to express his full conviction of the certainty of these predicted judgments, and to show that he had no pleasure in delivering such terrible messages, here speaks of himself as in great anguish at what he saw and heard. His bowels were in great commotion and agony; his heart was pained and in a tumult through consternation; he could not hold his peace, but must speak of what he foresaw coming on his people, if they persisted in refusing to hearken to him. For the whole scene was present in vision before his mind. He heard the trumpet sound the alarm; it was reported to him that one city after another was destroyed; and the whole land was desolated, as easily and speedily as a few tents may be removed; he had continually before his eyes the standard of war, and the trumpet still sounded in his ears. Upon this complaint, the Lord himself seems to speak, to convince his servant of the propriety of his conduct. He shows him, that though the Jews were his professed people, they were foolish and ignorant, and knew him not, because they disliked his holy character and service; they were heedless and inattentive as children; yea, they were sottish, stupid, unteachable children, and seemed destitute of common sense. —They had indeed some ingenuity in impiety and iniquity, but were perfectly destitute of understanding as to every thing good. In consequence of this declaration, the prophet is shown, in a vision, the whole land reduced to confusion and emptiness, like the original chaos: the heavens darkened, the mountains trembling, and all the inhabitants, and even the fowls of the air, driven away. This represents in the style of very sublime poetry the entire subversion of their civil and ecclesiastical government, the termination of all their prosperity, and the total desolation of the land, after the most violent convulsions; which is more plainly predicted in what follows: yet it is also intimated, that this ruin of the nation would not be final. V. 30, 31. (2 Kings ix. 30—33.) Jerusalem is here represented as a harlot: and it is inquired, What she would do, when these judgments came upon her? Her gay clothing and costly ornaments, and her painting, (which for the present might cover the defects of the face, but afterwards would rend it and make it deformed,) could be of no avail. —That is, none of Jerusalem's outward privileges or hypocritical professions, none of her contrivances and efforts, would prevent her destruction: for even the nations that had seduced her to idolatry, would despise her. The city is therefore next represented under the image of a travailing woman in her first labour, when her pains and fears may be supposed the greatest; for thus she must bewail the massacres and desolations that were coming upon her inhabitants.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13.

The Lord will assuredly pardon and bless all those, however criminal, who return to him with their whole hearts; and show that they are sincere penitents, "by putting "away all their abominations," as in his sight who "requires truth in the inward parts:" but a formal or a partial reformation will be of no avail. Whilst Christians, so called, are notoriously addicted to injustice, fraud, lying, and oppression; whilst they trifle with the most solemn oaths, which are administered without reverence, taken without consideration, and violated without hesitation; whilst they are multiplied on such frivolous occasions, and men show a contempt of God and of justice at the same time, by rash as well as profane swearing; it cannot be expected that Pagans or Mahometans should be much impressed in favour of Christianity, or expect much good from embracing it. But whenever a contrary conduct shall distinguish the disciple of Jesus from every other man, in all parts of the world, one grand obstacle to the conversion of the nations will be removed, and we may hope that they will be induced to bless themselves and glory in our God and Saviour. Our aim should therefore be, to prevail, if possible, with professed Christians, to break up the fallow ground, and not to sow among thorns: that, not content with empty forms and notions, they may seek for a humble, serious, and broken heart, in which the word of God may take root, and bring forth fruit to perfection. And we should begin with ourselves; for without serious self-examination, deep convictions of our guilt and depravity, fervent prayers, and constant endeavours to be influenced in our conduct by the truths we receive; all the advantages of revelation, and all the labours of the minister, will be in vain to us. Let us then recollect, that the true baptism, (as well as the true circumcision,) is that of the heart: and as the Lord commands us to put off the body of the sins of the flesh, and to remove, all the impediments of our corrupt nature, that we may fear, trust, and love him; let us turn these precepts into prayers, and entreat him to "create in us a clean heart, and renew a right spirit "within us." For "except a man be born again, he "cannot see," or enter into, "the kingdom of God;" and if men die unchanged, "his fury will come forth like "fire, and burn that none can quench it, because of the evil "of their doings." In a case therefore of such urgent necessity, the less we can do of ourselves, the more need we have to cry incessantly to the Lord for help. He commonly warns before he strikes: but if his warnings are despised, they will soon be realized in judgments: and when he ariseth to execute vengeance, sinners will find it in vain to combine for mutual defence, or to flee any whither for refuge; and no roaring lion, or destroyer of the nations, is to be dreaded, in comparison with "him who is able "to destroy both body and soul in hell." Yet when he uses ambitious men, beside their intention, as his instruments of temporal punishment, sinners are made to howl and lament. When he contends, men are soon dispirited and infatuated; their resolution and capacity fail them, and their hearts sink and perish within them: but none are more stupified with astonishment and terror on such occasions, than ungodly priests and false teachers! The justice of God, in leaving sinners to be deceived, and to expect peace when vengeance reacheth to the soul, is very awful. The faithful servants of God deprecate from the people this judgment, above all others; yet they often perceive that he sees good to inflict it. On this account they are treated as malevolent, censorious, and spiritually proud; for they cannot but remind their hearers of the distinction betwixt a faithful minister of the gospel, and a blind guide, or a teacher of lies in the garb of a priest: but the event will justify their conduct, and convince all the world of the reality and importance of this disregarded distinction.—When lighter calamities are not effectual to fan and cleanse congregations, Churches, or nations professing Christianity, God will give sentence upon them; a whirlwind and storm of vengeance will be commissioned to execute his word;

V. 14—31.

Exhortations and encouragements should be blended with warnings; that men may neither presume nor be left without hope: but we must still insist upon it, that without the heart be washed from wickedness, and vain thoughts and desires dislodged from it, there can be no salvation. We can also point out that Fountain, in which the most polluted may wash and be clean, and direct them to One, that is able and willing to assist them in this work: we can assure them, that all who are thus washed shall be saved: and we should distinguish between those who hate vain thoughts and sinful imaginations, but are often harassed by them; and those who love, entertain, and lodge them in their hearts. This hath too long been the case with us all: but how long do sinners intend that it should be so with them? Would they be willing to die when their hearts are thus occupied, and remain to eternity the proud carnal enemies of God and holiness? If not, no time should be lost. For his voice declareth from afar, that misery is speedily approaching, and especially against wicked professors of the gospel; and when this overtakes them, it will be evident, that their rebellious ways and doings have procured these things unto themselves; and that the fruit of wickedness is bitter and the end fatal. They who believe and preach the word of God, clearly foresee that destruction of sinners, of which others have little apprehension, and the prospect often pains them to the heart: and because they cannot hold their peace, but must warn, exhort, and expostulate with sinners, and entreat them to flee from the wrath to come, they are deemed troublers of the city: and they are accused of taking pleasure in denouncing damnation, whilst their aim and constant prayers are, that men may be wise and make haste to escape it, and while their benevolence, and compassion towards even their revilers, in their temporal distresses, refute the injurious charge. But often neither warnings nor judgments make due impression even on men called Christians; they show themselves foolish and rebellious, and prove that they know not the Lord; yea, sottish children, without common sense in the concerns of their souls, though in other respects ingenious, and reputed as oracles. But what a wretched thing is it to be wise to do evil and treasure up wrath, but to have no understanding to do good! Whatever else we know not, may the Lord make us to be of good understanding in the ways of godliness! How has sin marred God's fair creation, and almost reduced it again to a confused chaos! They whose treasure is on earth may be soon bereaved of it by revolutions in kingdoms, or human affairs, or removed from it by death: and ere long the visible creation will pass away, and be no more seen. But the Lord will not make a full end of his people. As for his enemies, their light will soon be put out in utter darkness: and all those things which have here appeared admirable or honourable in them, will terminate in contempt and misery, of which no images in nature can give us an adequate conception.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1, 2. We are not informed at what time this message was delivered; if it could be supposed to have been in the latter part of Josiah's reign, it might serve to explain the mystery of Providence, in removing so prematurely that pious king. Yet it can scarcely be conceived that the external conduct of the Jews was so very bad during his life: and therefore it may perhaps be referred to the time immediately succeeding his death, when their wickedness burst forth the more impetuously, for the temporary restraint that had been put upon it. The Lord speaks to the prophet, and a very few others, who interceded for the people; and directs them to make a diligent and accurate survey of Jerusalem, of her streets and broad places, where business was transacted, and where justice should have been administered; and let them see whether they could find a man that executed justice and sought the truth? and if they could, he would for his sake pardon the city. Their depravity was so universal, that none could be found, who either did justice to man, or inquired after the truth and will of God. If any such characters remained, they were driven into obscurity, and were afraid to show themselves. (Marg. Ref.) Especially not one could be met with, among the rulers and priests, who acted as a pious and upright man, in the important duties of his station: and even the few, who professed themselves the worshippers of JEHOVAH, and sware by his name, scrupled not to commit perjury, and to use that solemn act of worship to cloak their iniquity; and hesitated not to violate the vows which they had thus ratified.

4 Therefore I said, [i] Surely these are poor; they are foolish: for they know not the way of the LORD, nor the judgment of their God.

5 I will [k] get me unto the great men, and will speak unto them; for they have known the way of the LORD, and the judgment of their God: [l] but these have altogether broken the yoke, and burst the bonds.

6 Wherefore [m] a lion out of the forest shall slay them, [n] and a wolf of the * evenings shall spoil them, a leopard shall watch over their cities: every one that goeth out thence shall be torn in pieces: [o] because their transgressions are many, and their backslidings are † increased.

7 [p] How shall I pardon thee for this? thy children have forsaken me, and [q] sworn by them that are [r] no gods: when [s] I had fed them to the full, [t] they then committed adultery, and assembled themselves [u] by troops in the harlots' houses.

8 They were as fed horses in the morning: [x] every one neighed after his neighbour's wife.

9 Shall [y] I not visit for these things? saith the LORD: [z] and shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this?

10 ¶ Go [a] ye up upon her walls, and destroy; [b] but make not a full end: take away her battlements; for [c] they are not the LORD'S.

11 For the house of Israel and the house of Judah have [d] dealt very treacherously against me, saith the LORD.

12 They [e] have belied the LORD, and said, It is not he; [f] neither shall evil come upon us; neither shall we see sword nor famine.

13 And [g] the prophets shall become wind, and the word is not in them: thus shall it be done unto them.

14 Wherefore thus saith the LORD God of hosts, Because ye speak this word, behold, [h] I will make my words in thy mouth fire, and this people wood, and it shall devour them.

V. 3—6. Undeniable facts constrained the prophet to allow, that the character of his people was such as had been described. Were not the eyes of God upon the truth? His judgment was according to truth: he looked upon sincerity and equity with approbation, and he was concerned to maintain the cause of truth; but he could not fail to abhor the iniquity and hypocrisy that he witnessed. It was evident that the people despised his rebukes and corrections; and, refusing to profit by them, they obstinately persisted in impenitence, and their hearts were become even harder than a rock. He had hoped that this was only the case of the poor, who were profane and wicked, for want of a better education, and fuller instructions, and more leisure: having therefore met with discouragement in speaking to them, he purposed to address the rich and great, whose minds were more stored with the knowledge of God and his word, and who would better understand his instructions. But he found them still worse: for they had altogether cast off the yoke of subjection to God; broken through all the restraints of duty, conscience, fear, and shame: and run into the most enormous impiety and iniquity: therefore their enemies, like lions, or wolves, (in the evening, when they are most fierce and hungry,) and leopards, would be let loose to besiege their cities and destroy the inhabitants; especially as they grew more determined in their apostacy, notwithstanding all the methods used to reclaim them.

V. 7—9. Could it consist with the honour of God to pardon Israel? when one generation after another grew up in idolatry, and even sware by idols whose names they were forbidden to mention; thus giving them the honour due to the omniscient God alone. And when the Lord, who gave them their good land, had exceedingly prospered them, they assembled by troops, not only in the temples of their idols, but in the harlots' houses, without any regard to decency. Their idolatry was connected with lewdness, and their plenty led them to every kind of self-indulgence; so that in contempt of God's ordinance of marriage and of his holy law, they every one impetuously coveted his neighbour's wife, and sought opportunities of debauching her. And ought not the Lord to visit his professed people, when thus abandoned to licentiousness; and to take such vengeance on them, as would show his entire abhorrence of their abominations? And ought he not to be avenged of every nation, at any time, who should in such circumstances thus rebel against him?

V. 10—13. The Lord, having passed sentence on Jerusalem, commissions the Chaldeans to carry it into execution. Let them scale her walls and destroy her inhabitants; yet they should not make a full end: for a remnant would be preserved, as the seed of their Church and nation in future ages. Let them demolish all her fortifications, which the Lord disowned; for they had so profaned the city and temple, that he would no longer protect them.—The whole nation had treacherously broken their covenant; and they treated his word by his prophets as a falsehood, and by their unbelief made him a liar: thus they presumed that no evil would befal them, and that the messages of the prophets were merely as a blustering wind; nay, they imagined that the predicted calamities would fall on the prophets, and not on them!

V. 14. 'The effect of those threatenings, which are 'denounced by thy mouth, shall be as speedy and certain, 'as that of fire is when put to dry wood. Thus Christ is 15 Lo, [i] I will bring a nation upon you from far, [k] O house of Israel, saith the LORD: it is [l] a mighty nation, it is an ancient nation, [m] a nation whose language thou knowest not, neither understandest what they say.

16 Their [n] quiver is as an open sepulchre, they are all mighty men.

17 And [o] they shall eat up thine harvest and thy bread, which thy sons and thy daughters should eat; they shall eat up thy flocks and thine herds: they shall eat up thy vines and thy fig-trees: [p] they shall impoverish thy fenced cities, wherein thou trustedst, with the sword.

18 Nevertheless, in those days, saith the LORD, [q] I will not make a full end with you.

19 ¶ And it shall come to pass, when ye shall say, [r] Wherefore doeth the LORD our God all these things unto us? then shalt thou answer them, [s] Like as ye have forsaken me, and served strange gods in your land; so shall ye serve strangers in a land that is not yours.

21 Hear now this, [t] O foolish people, and without * understanding; which have eyes, and see not; which have ears, and hear not:

22 [u] Fear ye not me? saith the LORD: will ye not tremble at my presence, which have [x] placed the sand for the bound of the sea by a perpetual decree, that it cannot pass it: and though the waves thereof toss themselves, yet can they not prevail; though they roar, yet can they not pass over it.

23 But this people hath [y] a revolting and a rebellious heart; they are revolted and gone.

24 Neither say they in their heart, [z] Let us now fear the LORD our God, [a] that giveth rain, both the former and the latter, in his season: he reserveth unto us [b] the appointed weeks of the harvest.

* described as having a sharp sword proceeding out of his 'mouth; because the judgments he denounces against the 'wicked are like the sentence of a judge, which is cer-'tainly followed by execution.' (Lowth.)

V. 15—18. In the preceding verse God addressed the prophet; but here he speaks to the people, and declares that he will bring against them from afar, a very powerful and ancient nation.—The Jews had in former times been principally oppressed by the adjacent nations: but the Chaldeans came from a great distance, having subjugated all their former oppressors and become exceedingly powerful. The building of Babylon was begun soon after the flood; and we read of the Chaldeans in the book of Job, which is supposed to have been written as early as the time of Moses: (Job i. 17;) though the Chaldean monarchy had but lately been established.—God would bring this mighty nation upon them, to inflict the vengeance predicted by Moses, (Notes, Deut. xxviii. 48—59:) and as they used another language, which the Jews did not understand, they would be more regardless of their complaints, and cruel in their oppressions. When they opened their quivers, destruction would be the certain consequence; as the opening of a sepulchre denotes that death has taken place: and thus they would endure every misery, as far as consisted with their escaping total extirpation. Some indeed suppose this to mean, that God would still have further judgments in reserve for them. "For all this his anger is not turned "away; but his hand is stretched out still." In either sense it is a most remarkable prediction.—The vengeance executed on the Jews for crucifying the Lord of Glory, was far more terrible, and has been of vastly longer continuance, than that brought upon them by the Chaldeans: and yet a full end has not been made of the nation, which is at present exceedingly numerous, and is preserved distinct from other nations, no doubt for some very important purpose in Providence. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 19. 'Those who fall under the severity of God's 'judgments, are apt to think so favourably of themselves, 'as to wonder that they should be singled out as examples 'of divine vengeance. The Jews thought this severe pro-'ceeding scarcely consistent with the many gracious pro-'mises God had made unto their nation.' (Lowth.)—Yet the very books of Moses, if duly attended to, were fully sufficient to silence for ever this presumptuous objection. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 21—25. The whole seed of Jacob, but especially the Jews, are here called upon to hear the rebuke of God. He had given them senses, rational powers, and abundant opportunities of information; yet they continued as senseless as if destitute of eyes, ears, and understandings. (Note, Is. vi. 9.) The restless and impetuous waves of the ocean seemed to stand in awe of that decree, which God had given from the beginning to continue in perpetual force, that they should not pass the bounds of the sandy shore: but Israel, more senseless and unruly, reverenced not the authority of God, nor trembled at his wrath; but burst all the restraints of his law, in the rebellion of their apostate hearts, and were wholly revolted and gone into idolatry, impiety, and wickedness! Neither had they understanding to consider their own interest. When they adhered to the worship of God, he gave them seasonable rains and plentiful harvests; yet when their apostacy had caused him to withhold these good things from them, they could not be induced to return to him in order that they might recover them.

26 For [d] among my people are found wicked men: [e] they * lay wait as he that setteth snares; they set a trap, they [f] catch men.

27 As a † cage is full of birds, [g] so are their houses full of deceit: therefore they are become great, and waxen rich.

28 They are [h] waxen fat, they shine; yea, [i] they overpass the deeds of the wicked: [k] they judge [l] not the cause, the cause of the fatherless, yet they prosper; and the right of the needy do they not judge.

29 Shall [m] I not visit for these things? saith the LORD: shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this?

30 ¶ ‡ A wonderful and [n] horrible thing is committed in the land;

V. 26—29. Men as atrociously wicked might be found among God's people, as among the worst of the Gentiles. They were generally occupied in over-reaching and defrauding one another: and thus their houses were replenished with the gains of deceit, as the fowler's cage with the birds that he hath ensnared. In this manner they lived in luxury and magnificence, and even surpassed in wickedness the worst of sinners in other ages and nations. Nor did their rulers redress the wrongs done to the poor, the widows, and orphans, being induced to connivance by bribes, or other interested motives; and by these means they prospered, whilst the Lord was preparing vengeance against the whole nation. (Note, 7—9.) The last clause is very expressive in the original. "Shall not my soul be "avenged on a nation which is like unto this?"

V. 30, 31. The most wonderful and horrible wickedness that was committed in the land, and which above all things hastened the ruin of the nation, was the combination of the false prophets and ambitious priests, to seduce the people into a presumptuous security. The prophets accommodated their predictions to the humour of the chief priests, and the princes that were influenced by them; and thus the nation was deceived into the expectation of permanent prosperity, and submitted quietly to the despotic domination of the ungodly rulers and teachers: for they loved the flattering delusion, which encouraged them in sin; and were emboldened to despise the disagreeable messages of the true prophets. But what would they do, when the event should verify those dreadful denunciations, which they now treated as the effect of a gloomy imagination or a malevolent disposition?

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—14.

To what an awful condition is the earth reduced by sin, when even in those cities and countries, that are most favoured with the means of grace, so few are found, that "execute judgment and seek the truth," or who make any conscience of observing the most solemn oaths or sacred engagements? Alas! impiety and iniquity greatly abound in this our land; yet we may find a considerable number, who are both conscientious in their whole conduct, and steady friends to the truths of God: and for their sakes, in answer to their prayers, and by his blessing on their endeavours, we hope that the Lord will yet spare us. It must, however, be confessed, that the more carefully we investigate the state of religion, comparing it accurately with the standard of Scripture, the worse opinion we shall be constrained to entertain of it: and too often we find, that an attachment to the truths and an attendance on the most sacred ordinances of religion, are made subservient to mere secular designs. But nothing more provokes the Lord than our multiplied perjuries, prevaricating subscriptions in sacred things, and prostituted sacramental engagements. —We are sure that the eyes of the Lord are upon the truth; and, believing him to be righteous in his most mysterious dispensations, we shall gradually be led to see something of the reasons of his conduct; by observing the ingratitude, perverseness, and obstinate rebellion of sinners, who harden their hearts against his mercies, rebukes, corrections, and convictions. This is readily allowed to be the case of numbers in the lower orders of society, who are as profligate as ignorant; who neither know nor desire to be taught the way of the Lord, and who plead their want of learning and leisure as an excuse for the most abandoned vice and impiety. But if the faithful minister of God, discouraged by his ill success amongst them, and by their unteachableness and obstinacy, should embrace some opportunity of betaking himself to those in superior stations, and such as possess authority, affluence, dignity, or learning; he will commonly have cause to mourn under still greater discouragements. He will find the pride of superiority; the habits of being flattered, humoured, submitted to, and indulged, by every one and in every thing; their infidel contempt of sacred things, which they have learned sophistically to defend; and their enmity to the truths and precepts of the Gospel, which run counter to all their maxims, habits, and pursuits, far more insurmountable obstacles to his success, than the ignorant profligacy of the unprincipled poor. So that, in our land, though we have a few exceptions, to the honour of divine grace, to which nothing is impossible: yet it may be said of most of the great and noble, that "they have altogether broken "the yoke, and burst the bonds." Nay, in one respect they are worse than the Jewish nobles: for they are many of them more unacquainted with the Scriptures than the untutored multitude. This is an alarming symptom of the decayed condition of our constitution in church and state: and as our transgressions are multiplied, and our backslidings increased, we cannot but fear that national judgments, though mercifully retarded, will at length overtake us. And indeed how can we expect, that the Lord should always bear with and pardon us; when our youth are trained up in infidelity and impiety; when they abuse the bounty of Providence in licentious excess, and learn early to "commit adultery, and 'assemble themselves by troops 'in the harlots' houses:" and when such numbers, whose example should discountenance vice, not content with every other indulgence of their unbridled lusts, are "like fed horses in the morning, every one neighing after his neighbour's wife?" Shall not the LORD then visit for these "things? And will not his soul be avenged on such a nation "as this?" But in general the minister of God must expect to be disregarded, when he protests against such abominations, and warns ungodly men to beware of temporal judgments, and of eternal punishment: for their presumption commonly equals their profligacy; and sometimes they deem themselves entitled to the Lord's protection, and deserving of his favour, notwithstanding their enormous wickedness! We must therefore lay our account with being called misanthropes, hypocrites, or fanatics, if we faithfully declare the whole counsel of God. But whilst men thus revile or ridicule those who speak according to the oracles of God, they treat Him as a liar, his word as an imposture, and his denunciations as a bugbear; and they will surely find at length, that the words which they despised will prove fire to consume them as the fuel for the Lord's indignation.

V. 15—31.

Ministers are not at present authorized to predict national judgments, or to declare what instruments God intends to employ, or in what way he will punish sinners; but they are commissioned to declare, that all the prosperity and confidence of the ungodly will shortly fail, and leave them in everlasting misery and despair. If men will yet inquire, wherefore the Lord doeth these things unto them? Let them be referred to their unnumbered iniquities and manifold ungodliness for an answer. And let them be reminded, that the most tremendous effects of their sins might yet be prevented, if they could but be prevailed on to use their senses, faculties, and advantages in a proper manner. But, alas! for this they have no disposition; "having eyes they see not, having ears they hear not," and their rational powers leave them without understanding. So that, whilst all nature proclaims the perfections, and obeys the mandate of her Creator; man, with all his boasted powers, neither fears his wrath, regards his authority, is grateful for his mercies, nor values his favour; but his revolting and rebellious heart carries him far off from the worship and service of his Maker! And whilst the Lord, year after year, giveth plenteous seasons, and reserveth to us the appointed weeks of harvest, men live on his bounty, and are thus emboldened to increase their transgressions against him! Nay, when their iniquities have turned away these good things from them, they seldom so far consider even their temporal interest, as to use any means of recovering his favour; but vent their disquietude in rebellious complaints and bitter revilings of one another! It is notorious, that wickedness of every kind prevails among nominal Christians as much as among heathens; nay, that in some respects they even exceed them: so that they treat their brethren as lawful prey, and set traps and lay snares for each other, to plunder, defraud, enslave, or murder them, and thus fill their houses with abundance, through deceit; they wax rich and great, and live in luxury and splendour on the spoils of the poor. Nay, it is also to be lamented, that even rulers, out of interest and policy, often leave such men unmolested, and do not judge the cause of the orphan, the widow, the destitute, and oppressed. But whilst these things ripen guilty nations for vengeance, and ruin the souls of men, nothing is in reality so horrible and lamentable, as the ambition, avarice, ignorance, unfaithfulness, and wickedness of numbers, who are the nominal priests and prophets of the Lord. Too many, who pretend to teach religion, prophesy falsely; others enjoy affluence, dignity, and authority, by their means; and most of the people love to be thus soothed into a false and fatal security! But what will they do in the approaching day of judgment, and final retribution? "Oh that men were wise, that they understood these "things, that they would consider their latter end?"

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1. This chapter proceeds with the subjects of the foregoing, and predicts the increasing wickedness of the Jews till the captivity; as well as of the desolations that then took place. Part of Jerusalem was situated in the lot of Benjamin, and inhabited by that tribe: and they are here warned to prepare for leaving the city, that they might seek refuge in some other place.—In the beginning of the Chaldean invasion, the people no doubt flocked to Jerusalem as a place of safety, (25;) but this prophetical warning intimated, that it would soon be so straitened by the siege, that its old inhabitants would be glad to leave it. The signals, here mentioned, were those at that time in use. Beth-haccerem was about three miles from Jerusalem, in the road to Tekoa. (Marg. Ref.) their tents against her round about; they shall feed every one in his place.

4 [k] Prepare ye war against her: arise, and let us go up [l] at noon. Woe unto us! for the day goeth away, for the shadows of the evening are stretched out.

5 Arise, and let us go by night, and [m] let us destroy her palaces.

6 For thus hath the LORD of hosts said, [n] Hew ye down trees, [o] and * cast a mount against Jerusalem: [p] this is the city to be visited; she is [q] wholly oppression in the midst of her.

7 As [r] a fountain casteth out her waters, so she casteth out her wickedness: [s] violence and spoil is heard in her; before me continually is grief and wounds.

8 Be [t] thou instructed, O Jerusalem, [u] lest my soul † depart from thee; [x] lest I make thee desolate, a land not inhabited.

9 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, [y] They shall thoroughly glean the remnant of Israel as a vine: turn back thine hand as a grape-gatherer into the baskets.

10 ¶ To [z] whom shall I speak, and give warning, that they may hear? behold, [a] their ear is uncircumcised, and they cannot hearken: behold, [b] the word of the LORD is unto them a reproach; [c] they have no delight in it.

11 Therefore [c] I am full of the fury of the LORD; I am weary with holding in: [d] I will pour it out upon the children abroad, and upon the assembly of young men together: [e] for even the husband with the wife shall be taken, the aged with him that is full of days.

12 And [f] their houses shall be turned unto others, with their fields and wives together: for [g] I will stretch out my hand upon the inhabitants of the land, saith the LORD.

V. 2, 3. The prophet here compares Jerusalem to a beautiful woman, accustomed to a delicate and self-indulgent life, who would be soon exposed defenceless to brutal violence: or as some render it, to a verdant and luxuriant pasture, which allures the shepherds to bring their flocks to eat it up. Thus the invaders were induced, by the riches and prosperity of Jerusalem, to encamp in companies against her: and, meeting with feeble resistance, they soon devoured her and shared the spoil.

V. 4—8. The Lord here commissions the Chaldeans to prepare war against Jerusalem: and immediately they are represented as all in earnest and in motion, exciting each other to dispatch, lamenting that the least time is lost, and beginning or continuing their march, even during the night, as in haste to destroy her palaces. The Lord purposed that they should execute his judgments on that city, which was to be visited for her oppression and impiety: and they were as effectually induced to besiege it, as if he had headed their troops, and given the word of command. The wicked lives of the inhabitants sprang from their corrupt principles and depraved affections, as naturally and plentifully, as waters from the fountain: the cries of those who suffered violence and oppression were continually heard in the city; and the Lord meditated to repay their wickedness with grief and wounds. Yet still instruction was given and mercy proposed, which would leave the obstinate transgressors more inexcusable, but would give encouragement to the few who might repent: and the people were warned to profit by their peculiar advantages, otherwise the special favour of God for them as a nation would be discontinued, as well as their land left desolate. 'This 'threatening received a further completion in that final 'desolation brought upon them by the Romans.' (Lowth.)

V. 9. The Chaldeans would not only carry away captive the principal people of the land; but they would return again and again, to gather the poor remains, till all were gone: as the gleanings of the vine are gathered; when the gatherer having put some of the grapes into his basket, turns back his hand to collect those that yet remain, and to convey them to the same place.

V. 10—12. (Notes, v. 4, 5. Isaiah xxviii. 9—13.) The prophet had without success addressed both the poor and the rich: and to whom should he now give warning? Pride, prejudice, and the love of idols and iniquities, so closed their ears, that the word of God could find no entrance: they could not hearken, because they hated God and his service; and their inability aggravated their guilt. They counted his precepts, warnings, and reproofs, to be a reproach to them: they were affronted at the prophets for describing their characters, exposing the ingratitude and rebellion of their conduct, and showing what punishment they deserved and were exposed to: they could not endure those teachers, who were always reproaching them with their sins; but preferred such as had a better opinion of them, and gave them more encouragement; (Notes, Luke xi. 45. 2 Tim. iv. 3, 4.) The prophet, perceiving them set against his testimony, seems to have been tempted to decline his work: but he was inwardly constrained to speak, being full of the furious indignation of the Lord against their sins, and not able to withhold himself from declaring it. He would therefore pour his warnings out before the first persons that he met with; though they should be the children playing in the streets, or the young men assembled for their pleasure and diversion: as he clearly foresaw desolating judgments coming upon all the inhabitants of the land. (Marg. Ref.) prophet even unto the priest every one dealeth falsely.

14 They have [k] healed also * the hurt of the daughter of my people slightly, saying, Peace, peace; when there is no peace.

15 Were [l] they ashamed when they had committed abomination? nay, they were not at all ashamed, neither could they blush: [m] therefore they shall fall among them that fall; [n] at the time that I visit them, they shall be cast down, saith the LORD.

16 ¶ Thus saith the LORD, [o] Stand ye in the ways, and see, and ask for the old paths, where is the good way, [p] and walk therein, and [q] ye shall find rest for your souls. But they said, [r] We will not walk therein.

17 Also [s] I set watchmen over you, saying, [t] Hearken to the sound of the trumpet. But they said, We will not hearken.

18 Therefore, [u] hear, ye nations, and know, O congregation, what is among them.

19 Hear, [x] O earth: behold, I will bring evil upon this people, [y] even the fruit of their thoughts, [z] because they have not hearkened unto my words, nor to my law, but rejected it.

20 To [a] what purpose cometh there to me incense from [b] Sheba, and the [c] sweet cane from a far country? [d] your burnt-offerings are not acceptable, nor your sacrifices sweet unto me.

21 Therefore thus saith the LORD, Behold, [e] I will lay stumbling-blocks before this people, [f] and the fathers and the sons together shall fall upon them; the neighbour and his friend shall perish.

22 Thus saith the LORD, Behold, [g] a people cometh from the north country, and a great nation shall be raised from the sides of the earth.

23 They [h] shall lay hold on bow and spear; they are [i] cruel, and have no mercy; [k] their voice roareth like the sea; and they ride upon horses, set in array as men for war against thee, O daughter of Zion.

24 We [l] have heard the fame thereof:

V. 13—15. The words rendered "given to covetous-"ness," are peculiarly emphatical. The priests and prophets dealt falsely for filthy lucre's sake. (Marg. Ref.) They should have probed the consciences of the people, and faithfully shown them their real state and character; and, taking the opportunity of public calamities or perils, have attempted to lead them to true repentance and conversion: but instead of treating them in this faithful and skilful manner, which would have put them to some pain, but might have effected a radical cure, being themselves slaves to avarice, they only directed them to superficial observances, and then assured them of peace and prosperity: thus the wound was skinned over without being cured, and was sure to break out more fatally in a little time. This seems especially to be the abomination, of which the prophet next speaks, and which having committed, they were not ashamed of: nay, when the event showed them to be lying prophets, they could not be put to the blush, but faced it out with the utmost effrontery: and still carried on the same infamous business for filthy lucre's sake. The Lord had therefore determined, that the covetous priests and lying prophets should be marked for destruction among those that should fall by the sword. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 16, 17. The Lord here reminds the people of the directions that he had always given them by his prophets, in order that they might know and walk in his ways. They were called on to attend to instruction, and to inquire for the old way, which had been prescribed by Moses and their ancient prophets, and which was marked with the footsteps of the patriarchs and their fathers in more prosperous days. Thus by diligent inquiry they would find the good way of repentance, faith, and holy obedience, and, walking therein, they would find rest to their souls. But they resolved, and avowed their determination, not to walk in those ways: and when the Lord had set his prophets as watchmen to sound the alarm of approaching judgments, they determined not to take warning! (Notes, Matt. xi. 16—19. 23—30.)

V. 18—20. The nations, and the congregation of Israel, yea, the whole earth, are here called upon to hear and understand the wickedness that was found among the Lord's people, for which he would bring evil upon them: this would be the natural consequence of their rebellious thoughts and devices, and of their rejection of his law and authority. And how could they expect that their hypocritical burning of costly incense and perfumes, and their multiplied sacrifices, could be acceptable to him; when the spirit, in which they offered them, was an additional provocation? (Marg. Ref.)

V. 21. The Lord, provoked by the sins of the Jews, was determined so to order his providential dispensations, as to occasion their judicial infatuation. Thus they would through their own perverseness, stumble and fall, by choosing those measures which directly tended to their ruin. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 22, 23. (Notes, i. 13, 14. v. 15—18. Marg. Ref.) 'Hostile invasions are fitly compared to great inunda-'tions, that carry all before them, and lay a country waste.' (Lowth.)

V. 24—26. The people seem to be here prophetically represented as discoursing on the report of the Chaldean invasion: and being filled with anguish and dismay, they exhort one another to keep close within the walls of Jerusalem; as all other places were exposed to the ravages of the enemy, and full of terror and destruction. And then the people are warned to show every token of sorrow and distress, as they would suddenly be plundered, with immense slaughter, by the victorious assailants.

V. 27—30. The Lord had raised up the prophet, made him courageous and firm in his duty, and secured him as a fortress against every enemy: not with an intention to preserve the city from ruin; but to prove and discover the temper of the people, to show their incorrigible wickedness, and to illustrate the divine justice in punishing them: thus he was appointed to investigate their whole conduct, and to bring in his report concerning them. For they were most grievous rebels and apostates, who slandered the ways and prophets of God, to excuse themselves. They pretended to be gold or silver: but indeed they were base metal, without any mixture of precious ore; and they continually corrupted one another more and more. The prophets, whom the Lord used as instruments to refine and purify them, were not only worn out to no purpose, but put to death for attempting it; as if the refiner's bellows were thrown into the fire, and his lead consumed to no purpose: nay, all the judgments and mercies of God were in vain; for wickedness was not separated from among them. Indeed the whole mass of them was proved to be refuse metal, and not silver, as it had once appeared to be; and men would treat them with contempt, because God no longer regarded them as his people. 'Their impudence resembles brass, and their obstinacy may be 'compared to iron.' 'Before the use of quicksilver was 'known, they made use of lead for refining their metals.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15.

Ungodly prosperity, when the Lord is provoked to withdraw his protection, renders men the richer prey to the rapacious, and affords them no security against their depredations: and the more admired, indulged, or delicate they are, the more dreadful will they find it to endure hardship. —They that are intent upon worldly gain or greatness, (though by means of the miseries of others,) are assiduous, indefatigable, lose no time, deny themselves even ordinary refreshments, and consider hinderances as grievous calamities: how shameful then is it, that we should be so attached to our ease and indulgence, when the glory of God, the welfare of our neighbours, and the salvation of our souls, demand our vigorous and patient activity! The Lord uses wicked men as the executioners of his vengeance: and he girds, directs, and prospers them, though they know him not: but it is far more desirable, in the humblest station, to subserve the good of our brethren, and it will meet with a far different recompense. The wickedness of men's lives springs from the corrupt nature of their hearts; this fountain may, in part and for a time, be stopped; yet it will cast forth its waters; and unless it be cleansed and changed, we can do nothing spiritually good. —All the secret, as well as open, iniquity in the world, is continually before the eyes of the Lord, and he will repay oppressors with more terrible miseries than they occasion to their poor brethren. To be separated from God and his favour, is the greatest evil that can befal a rational creature: yet numbers hear the Judge himself declare that he will at last say to all the wicked, "Depart from me, ye "cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and "his angels," and yet continue careless and unconcerned! Nay, they even seem to "say to the Almighty, Depart "from us, we desire not the knowledge of thy ways!"—So long as men continue uninstructed amidst opportunities of instruction, and unsanctified amidst the best means of sanctification, there is reason to fear that the Lord will depart from them in final indignation: he will surely withdraw the light of his gospel from those who generally despise and abuse it: and this is a more grievous judgment than any temporal calamity. When he shall arise to take vengeance, no sinners, of any age, rank, or sex, can possibly escape; but they shall all be collected, as grapes are gathered to be cast into the wine-press. Obvious and incontrovertible as these truths are, but few properly notice them. Most men stop their ears against all salutary warnings and instructions: and their pride and lusts render them incapable of hearing, understanding, believing, and obeying the gospel of Christ. They deem the faithful preaching of God's word a reproach and affront to them; and either neglect all religious instruction, or turn away their ears from the truth, or hearken to fables. This often so

CHAP. VII.

Jeremiah is sent to call the Jews to repentance that they might not be removed; to reprove their presumptuous confidence in the temple, while living in gross wickedness; and to predict that Jerusalem would be desolated like Shiloh, and the people carried captive, as Israel had been, 1—15. God directs the prophet not to pray for them. He shows him their idolatries and the judgments about to come upon them, 16—20. He refuses the sacrifices of the disobedient; and exposes the perverse conduct of the nation from their departure out of Egypt, 21—28. A call to mourning for the prevailing abominations, and a denunciation of desolating judgments, 29—34.

discourages the zealous minister, that he has little heart to speak any more: yet a sense of duty, zeal for the honour of God, holy indignation against sin, and a hope of rescuing a few at least from perdition, constrain him to speak, and to declare the wrath of God against the impenitent workers of iniquity; and being weary of holding in, he may sometimes introduce the important subject in such places and companies as many deem unseasonable and improper. But every man is concerned in it; few are duly sensible of its importance and of their own danger; and those scenes of amusement and pleasure, which engross the time, the thoughts, and affections of the young and gay, are proofs what need they have of being "warned to flee from the "wrath to come." But that covetousness, to which elder persons are addicted, is a more dangerous obstruction to the care of the soul, than the diversions of children, or the dissipated pleasures of youth. If we judge of this vice by the word of God, we shall find immense multitudes, in every rank of life, given up to it: and too often we shall have to lament, that even the ministers of religion are by it induced to deal falsely in most sacred matters. Many are so taken up with forming connexions and seeking preferment, that they neglect the study of the Scriptures, and the discharge of their duty; they adopt smooth, fashionable, soothing systems of divinity: like unskilful surgeons, they heal every wound slightly; either because they know no better; or because they choose not to avow sentiments unfavourable to their interests, or to utter things grating to the ears of their generous patrons. Thus they speak Peace, peace, when there is no peace. Whilst sinners are ashamed of the abominations which they have committed, their case is hopeful: but when they are incapable of blushing, and can glory in their shame, it is very dreadful.

V. 16—30.

If we would learn the safe and happy path, amidst the discordant opinions that prevail, let us look well to our steps, put ourselves in the way of instruction, ask wisdom of God, and reduce what we know to practice: especially let us diligently inquire for the old paths, in which patriarchs, prophets, apostles, martyrs, and other honoured servants of God, have walked, and which they have pointed out to others. (Notes, Heb. xi.) Following their steps, we cannot fail of finding rest to our souls. But many know nothing of these ways, and take no pains to inquire after them: many prefer modern improvements and discoveries: nay, many treat these ancient ways as novel inventions and enthusiastical reveries; and others have some speculative knowledge of them, yet do not walk in them. But if men will not obey the voice of God, nor take warning when his watchmen sound the alarm, nor flee to his appointed refuge; it will appear at the day of judgment to all the world, that their ruin originated from their own wicked thoughts, because they would not hearken unto God's words, but rejected them. Nor can any man reasonably expect that the Lord should accept the most costly oblations or services, which are offered in impenitence, or in proud contempt of the sacrifice and intercession of our great High Priest. To such men, even this tried Foundation becomes a Rock of offence: and every doctrine, and ordinance, and providential dispensation, concurs in blinding and hardening them to their perdition: and thus unbelievers will perish together, being unable to help one another. They despise indeed the distant report, both of temporal judgments and of eternal punishment; but their near approach will soon cause their courage to fail, and then anguish will seize upon them: for the sword of the most cruel enemy is as nothing, in comparison of the final wrath of Almighty God. In short, sinners must lament and mourn, either here in penitent sorrow and self-abasement; or hereafter with doleful, unavailing, and eternal wailing and gnashing of teeth. If the bold and faithful ministers of God are not instrumental to the conversion of those whom they address, they will be found unanswerable witnesses against them, and men will be judged and condemned according to their word. And when warnings, corrections, rebukes, and every means of grace, leave men unrenewed, they will be left as rejected of God to everlasting contempt and misery.

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 1, 2. This chapter begins a new prophecy, which probably was delivered some time after the preceding. The prophet was commanded to station himself in the entrance of the temple, and there to proclaim his message to all who came thither to worship, probably on some of their solemn feast-days. This must have given great offence to the chief priests, and those in authority in ecclesiastical concerns.

3 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; [d] Amend your ways and your doings, and I will cause you to dwell in this place.

4 [e] Trust ye not in lying words, saying, [f] The temple of the LORD, The temple of the LORD, The temple of the LORD, are these.

5 For [g] if ye thoroughly amend your ways and your doings; [h] if ye thoroughly execute judgment between a man and his neighbour;

6 If ye [i] oppress not the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow, [k] and shed not innocent blood in this place, [l] neither walk after other gods to your hurt:

7 Then [m] will I cause you to dwell in this place, [n] in the land that I gave to your fathers, for ever and ever.

8 Behold, [o] ye trust in lying words, that cannot profit.

9 Will ye [p] steal, murder, and commit adultery, and swear falsely, [q] and burn incense unto Baal, [r] and walk after other gods whom ye know not;

10 And [s] come and stand before me in this house, * which is called by my name, and say, We are delivered to do all these abominations?

11 Is [t] this house, which is called by my name, become a den of robbers in your eyes? Behold, [u] even I have seen it, saith the LORD.

12 But go ye now unto [x] my place which was in Shiloh, [y] where I set my name at the first, [z] and see what I did to it for the wickedness of my people Israel.

13 And now, because ye have done all these works, saith the LORD, [a] and I spake unto you, rising up early and speaking, but ye heard not; [b] and I called you, but ye answered not;

14 Therefore will I do unto this house, which is called by my name, [c] wherein ye trust, and unto the place which I gave to you and to your fathers, [d] as I have done to Shiloh.

15 And [e] I will cast you out of my sight, as I have cast out all your brethren, even [f] the whole seed of Ephraim.

V. 4. The people gloried and trusted in the temple of JEHOVAH, even when they were given up to idolatry and wickedness: and when the prophets foretold judgments from God upon the city and nation, they boasted that the temple and its courts and solemnities belonged to the Lord; and they were confident that he would spare the city on that account. Thus they trusted in lying words, which the false prophets spake to them: as if they were so unalterably the favourites of heaven, that they might be sure of protection, whatever wickedness they committed.

V. 5—7. As the omniscient God foresaw that the Jews would not thus repent, and amend their lives: the absolute predictions of desolating judgments, were not inconsistent with these conditional promises: and as it was their undeniable duty, thoroughly to amend their ways, and to "do justice, love mercy, and walk humbly with "their God;" it was peculiarly honourable to him, thus to hold out encouragements to them, in case they attended to his exhortations. The prescience or decrees of God cannot be the rule or motive of man's duty: and the exhortations, promises, and threatenings, should always be considered as abstracted from that incomprehensible subject: because this is the scriptural and rational way of stating this matter, for "secret things belong unto the "LORD our God; but those things which are revealed be- "long to us, and to our children for ever, that we may do "all the words of his law."

V. 10, 11. The Jews acted as if God had delivered and protected them, that they might have the opportunity of committing every kind of abomination: thus men sometimes appear very penitent, when they are sick and think themselves near death; but when they recover, they return to wickedness, as if they supposed the Lord had restored them for that purpose. Or they thought that an attendance on the temple-worship had delivered them from the guilt of their past sins, and that they might now without concern return to their idolatries and indulgences: as some men task themselves with fastings and devotions, and come to the Lord's table; that, having, as they think, settled the old account, they may return to their former course of life without scruple, till the next reckoning day. Thus they made the house of God a den of robbers, by frequenting it in the midst of their unrepented frauds, oppressions, murders, adulteries, and perjuries; and yet they thought, that the temple, which they so profaned, would be their protection! (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12—15. (Note, 1 Sam. i—iv.) The tabernacle and ark of God had been long stationed at Shiloh; till at length the impiety of Eli's sons, and the wickedness of the people, provoked God to give up the ark into captivity: then it was finally removed from Shiloh, which was afterwards reduced, or desolated. Yet the inhabitants of that city had had as good ground to presume that God would preserve them for the sake of his sanctuary, as the inhabitants of Jerusalem now had; especially as the latter were become still more abandoned, in the midst of more abundant means and advantages. Accordingly the Lord assured them, that he would deal with Jerusalem, as he had with

Shiloh; destroying the temple, removing all the sacred utensils, and utterly destroying the city: and that he would drive the inhabitants out of their favoured land, into heathen countries, as he had done the Israelites; banishing them, as it were, from the sight of his eyes; (Deut. xi. 12.)

V. 16. The prophet, hoping that the threatenings were not absolute, continued to intercede for the people. But the Lord not only said to him, "Let me alone;" (Note, Exod. xxxii. 10;) but he absolutely forbade him to pray for them any more, for he would not hear him, nor would he have him pray in vain. He might pray for the conversion and salvation of individuals; for the mitigation of national judgments; for the preservation of the Jews during the captivity, and for their restoration: but he was not allowed any more to deprecate the destruction of the city and temple, the desolations of the land, and the captivity of the people. 'Nothing but an universal reforma-'tion, which God foresaw would not be effected, could 'deliver the Jews from captivity and desolation.—The 'divine decree being without repentance irrevocable, God 'forbids Jeremiah to interpose his prayers for the revers-'ing of it.' (Lowth.)

V. 17, 18. To convince the prophet that the irreversible sentence was most just, the Lord calls his attention to the unanimous zeal of old and young, men and women, for their abominable idolatries.

—Queen, &c. This may be understood of the moon, or of the whole frame of the visible heavens, of which the people had some image or symbol, that they worshipped with great earnestness.—Some think that the cakes here mentioned were stamped with the likeness of the idol to which they were offered. It is remarkable that the papists have adopted this title in the worship of the Virgin Mary; styling her "the queen of heaven;" as if they were ambitious of resembling the Jews in their idolatry.

V. 19. The people committed wickedness, as if they meant it on purpose to affront the Lord: but did they think they could do him any real harm? Or could they expect any other, than to expose themselves by it to confusion and misery?

V. 21—23. The Jews confided in their sacrifices, as if by them they made the Lord their debtor. But he bade them take their burnt-offerings (the whole of which was consumed on the altar) along with their other sacrifices, and feast upon them, for he would not accept of them: or to put the burnt-offerings with the peace-offerings, on which the priests and offerers feasted, instead of consuming them on the altar. The intention of the whole revelation to Israel at mount Sinai was, to lead the people to obedience, and the sacrifices were appointed in subserviency to that end. They were in themselves instances of obedience; they formed an expression of the people's repentance, and faith in the promised Saviour; and they were means of grace, and of communion with God: all which, when genuine, conduce to the conscientious obedience of holy fear and love. In this way the Lord would have been their God, and they would have been his people: but all their external observances must be worthless, when this obedience was wanting. (Note, 1 Sam. xv. 22, 23.)

27 Therefore [d] thou shalt speak all these words unto them; [e] but they will not hearken to thee: thou shalt also call unto them; but they will not answer thee.

28 But thou shalt say unto them, This is a nation that obeyeth not the voice of the LORD their God, [f] nor receiveth * correction: [g] truth is perished, and is cut off from their mouth.

29 ¶ [h] Cut off thine hair, O Jerusalem, and cast it away, [i] and take up a lamentation on high places: [k] for the LORD hath rejected and forsaken [l] the generation of his wrath.

30 For the children of Judah have done evil in my sight, saith the LORD: [m] they have set their abominations in the house which is called by my name, to pollute it.

31 And they have built [n] the high places of Tophet, which is in [o] the valley of the son of Hinnom, [p] to burn their sons and their daughters in the fire; [q] which I commanded them not, neither † came it into my heart.

32 Therefore, behold, [r] the days come, saith the LORD, that it shall no more be called Tophet, nor the valley of the son of Hinnom, but, The valley of slaughter: [s] for they shall bury in Tophet till there be no place.

33 And [t] the carcases of this people shall be meat for the fowls of the heaven, and for the beasts of the earth; and none shall fray them away.

34 Then will I cause [u] to cease from the cities of Judah, and from the streets of Jerusalem, the voice of mirth, and the voice of gladness, the voice of the bridegroom, and the voice of the bride: [x] for the land shall be desolate.

V. 24—28. The prophet ought not to be discouraged, as if his labours were singularly unsuccessful: for the people had always been disobedient and obstinate, notwithstanding all the means which God, by his servants, had perseveringly used to reclaim them. The command given to Jeremiah to speak all the words of God to his people, though previously assured that they would not believe and obey them, shows that invitations, exhortations, and expostulations are in no wise inconsistent with the prescience of God that they will not obey them; nor with his decree to "give men up to their own hearts "lusts." Such protestations, indeed, tend evidently to manifest the divine justice in pouring out his vengeance on hardened rebels, and answer most important purposes in the moral government of God.

V. 29. The hair of the Nazarites was the token of their peculiar dedication to the Lord, which was terminated or profaned, when it was cut off. (Notes, Num. vi:) and cutting or shaving the hair was in all cases a token of grief and humiliation. Thus Jerusalem was ordered to cut off her hair, as about to be profaned and trodden down by the Gentiles: she was also to use every token of deep distress; for that generation of Israel would endure the servere wrath of God, and be rejected and forsaken by him. This implied, that there was mercy in reserve for future generations of that people.

V. 30. (Marg. Ref.) Manasseh placed his idols in the courts of the temple, nay, in the temple itself!

V. 31. The Lord had never commanded such unnatural and cruel sacrifices as are here described, or they might have had some excuse for renouncing his worship. But indeed he had prohibited them and abhorred them as most detestable: and yet the people preferred the worship of Molech, which imposed on them so hard an injunction!

V. 32, 33. Tophet is supposed to have had its name from the drums they beat, or the noises they made, to drown the cries of their tortured children. But it should no longer serve for that purpose, or retain its ancient name; but be called "the valley of slaughter," from the multitudes of the Jews that would be slaughtered in it, and there buried, till it was full of graves; and then the remainder of dead bodies would be left unburied, to be devoured by beasts and birds of prey.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—15.

The great doctrines and precepts of the Scriptures should be proclaimed in the most public manner; and they that are employed in this service, must not fear the faces or respect the persons of men, whatever be their rank or office. Faithful preaching should attend on the administration of other sacred ordinances, that men may be warned not to rest in forms, and to beware of irreverence or hypocrisy. No observances, creeds, affections, or supposed revelations, in which men glory and confide, will profit them, if they do not sincerely and thoroughly amend their ways and doings. They may trust in lying words, presuming themselves to be the people of God, and entitled to all the blessings of his covenant; whilst they neglect justice and equity, oppress the stranger, the fatherless, and widow, or commit other atrocious crimes: but if God would not suffer Israel to inhabit Canaan, when they thus abused their privileges, will he admit those into heaven who copy their example? He graciously pardons and saves the most atrocious criminals, who embrace his gospel; and his "grace teaches them to deny ungodliness and worldly "lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly in this "present world;" but no one can have any ground to deem himself interested in this free salvation, who allows himself in the practice of one known sin, or the habitual neglect of one known duty. But presumptuous hypocrites deny, overlook, or evade these conclusions, by various subterfuges; and they turn from one delusion to another, as times and circumstances change. The legal Pharisee, for instance, pays a sort of quit-rent to the Lord, by a task of austerity or devotion; and thus he purchases the liberty, as he supposes, to live the rest of his time according to his own plan. And many such men, after all their sanctimonious scrupulosity, will cheat, lie, perjure, commit adultery, or any other wickedness, which they hope may escape detection and punishment from man. But the evangelical Pharisee and antinomian enthusiast make a cheaper bargain. They receive a mutilated and distorted evangelical creed into a carnal heart; they contend earnestly for the doctrines of free grace: they mistake some change of sentiment or sect, or some lively impression on the imagination or affections, for a new creation unto holiness; they call the most open apostacy backsliding; or the most notorious and unrepented vices "the spots of God's "children;" and then, by abusing the doctrine of final perseverance, they hope to live the life of the wicked, and at last to die the death of the righteous! Thus men sin on, that grace may abound, and treat Christ as the minister of sin; they think themselves delivered from wrath, to commit all kinds of abomination; and speak of the Church of God, as if it were a den of robbers, adulterers, and covetous oppressors! They who are not conversant with such matters, can scarcely deem it possible that men should hold such impious sentiments: yet it is, alas! too true that many do; and it is no more incredible, than that the Jews should come from their idols and lusts to the temple of God, and then be confident of his protection, because his ordinances were thus profaned among them! If any thing could break this strong delusion, the dealings of God with his ancient people might teach men another lesson: but the cross of Christ, when duly understood, forms the most effectual antidote to these detestable sentiments. Did the Son of God then give himself for our transgressions, to show the justice and holiness of God, the excellency and obligation of the violated law, and the evil and desert of sin; and was this in order to give his followers leave to commit sin with impunity? But when men have gone far into these delusions, they are seldom recovered: and though we are not forbidden to pray for any person, or people, by name; yet there are some, respecting whom we feel discouragement, whenever we attempt to plead in their behalf: as if the Lord said to us, "Make no intercession for "them, for I will not hear thee."

Whatever enormity we witness in the conduct of the ignorant and profane, there remains some hope concerning them: but presumptuous professors, who commit and plead for sin, must in general be let alone. If, however, they will learn nothing from us, we may learn from them, "whilst we think we stand, to take heed lest we fall:" and to be as diligent and as careful in instructing our children in the truths of God, and in habituating them to attend on divine ordinances, as they often are in initiating them in the mysteries of iniquity. Hardened sinners often delight in showing their contempt of God, as if this could interrupt his happiness, when it only provokes him to hasten and enhance their misery. Nothing can avert the ruin of those who persist in disobedience: and we understand the Gospel as little as the Jews did the law, if we think that a notional belief and a high confidence that we are the people of God can avail those who persist in rebellion; or that he will accept any particular actions or services, which are intended as compensations for continuing in the practice of some beloved iniquity. The way is indeed open for the sinner to return; and when we are brought to obey the Gospel, all former offences are pardoned, imperfect services are accepted, the Lord becomes our God, and numbers us among his people; we learn to walk in his ways, and it is well with us; his Gospel furnishes us with motives, encouragements, and assistance; and his ordinances are means of grace to our souls. But he abhors external services, when men continue to follow their own counsels, to walk after their own evil imaginations; and when they grow worse in the midst of opportunities of improvement. The minister must speak all the message of God, though men will not hear: he must call on them to repent, and invite them to come to Christ, even if he knows they will reject his message: and when individuals or nations cast off the authority of God, and refuse correction; or become so addicted to dissimulation and hypocrisy, that truth perisheth, and is cut off from their mouth; their guilt should be charged home upon them, and warning given them. The Lord hates sin the most when it is nearest to him; and the profanation of his solemn ordinances is the worst of all impiety. If men were required to endure such losses, hardships, weariness, or expense, in the service of God, as they often impose on themselves in their sinful pursuits, they would complain loudly of his commandments. But they are frequently cruel to themselves, their families, and children; they ruin their health or circumstances, and act contrary to natural affection, without complaining, when serving sin and Satan. All the precepts and prohibitions of the Lord are holy, just, and good; and the self-denial he requires, rational and salutary. But the devil is a cruel tyrant in this world: what will he then be, as a tormentor in the next? There all joy will for ever cease from the workers of iniquity. May we then learn to relish holy and spiritual joys, and to sit loose to all other satisfactions, however lawful in themselves.

AT [a] that time, saith the LORD, they shall bring out the bones of the kings of Judah, and the bones of his princes, and the bones of the priests, and the bones of the prophets, and the bones of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, out of their graves:

2 And they shall [b] spread them before the sun, and the moon, and all the host of heaven, [c] whom they have loved, and whom they have served, and after whom they have walked, and whom they have sought, and whom they have worshipped: they shall not be gathered, nor be buried; [d] they shall be for dung upon the face of the earth.

3 And [e] death shall be chosen rather than life, by all the residue of them that remain of this evil family, which remain [f] in all the places whither I have driven them, saith the LORD of hosts.

4 ¶ Moreover, thou shalt say unto them, Thus saith the LORD; [g] Shall they fall, and not arise? shall he [h] turn away, and not return?

5 Why then is this people of Jerusalem [i] slidden back by a perpetual backsliding? they [k] hold fast deceit, [l] they refuse to return.

6 I [m] hearkened and heard, but they spake not aright: [n] no man repented him of his wickedness, [o] saying, What have I done? Every one turned to his course, [p] as the horse rusheth into the battle.

7 Yea, [q] the stork in the heaven knoweth her appointed times; and [r] the turtle, and the crane, and the swallow observe the time of their coming; but [s] my people know not the judgment of the LORD.

8 How do ye say, [t] We are wise, and [u] the law of the LORD is with us? Lo, certainly * in vain made he it; the pen of the scribes is in vain.

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1—3. When the Chaldeans had taken Jerusalem, without doubt they accomplished this prediction: and being enraged at the Jews, especially at the rulers and teachers, who had violated their treaties, and made so obstinate a resistance, they absurdly vented their indignation, by abusing the bodies of the dead, as well as by massacreing the living. Thus the bones were taken from the graves, and spread before the sun, moon, and stars: and they were disgraced and left as dung on the earth, as it were in the presence of those creatures whom they had worshipped and served, instead of the great Creator. Their idolatry is spoken of in a variety of phrases of similar import, to show their excessive attachment to it. And the remains of Israel, (no more worthy to be called a holy nation, but an evil family,) being dispersed into distant countries, would encounter such miseries, as would cause them to envy those who were slain at the taking of the city. Some think that the Chaldeans broke open the monuments of the great men, in searching for the treasures which were frequently laid up in them. The latter part of the second verse may more literally be rendered, "Because "they loved them, and because they served them," &c. They were thus disgraced, by the just judgment of God, for their idolatry.

V. 4—7. Some explain the fourth verse to this sense, 'Are they so plunged in sins and miseries—that 'there is no hope of their recovery? If they will turn to 'God, will not he immediately be pacified and return to 'them?' (Lowth.) The same word is in that verse rendered turn and return; but if a man have turned out of the way, he must turn again, in order to return into it: so that the same sense is preserved by the interpretation given below, which seems most agreeable to the context, and the scope of the prophet's keen expostulations. If men fall into a pit, or fall down by the road, they attempt to rise again, and are glad of assistance; when they fall into trouble, they endeavour to extricate themselves; and if a traveller have lost his way, he will bear to be told of his mistake, and be ready to ask for information, and to return back to the road. Why then did the people of Jerusalem persist in apostacy from God? Why were they so obstinate in their idolatry, notwithstanding all the methods used to reclaim them? It was undeniable, that they were fallen into sin and misery; and yet they held fast the delusion, and could not be induced to return to the worship and service of God! They were fallen into a pit, and would not attempt to get out of it! They had wandered from the way, and would not attempt to return to it! The Lord had his eye upon them in all their trials, but he saw no man who spake aright and as became sinners in such circumstances. None of them repented of their sins, or condemned themselves for their rebellion, ingratitude, and folly. On the contrary, every one of them returned to his sinful practices, with as little regard to consequences, as the impetuous horse rushes into the battle. Even the birds of passage knew the times which Providence had appointed for their removal from one climate to another; but the Jews, more stupid than they, could not perceive the signs of the times; they did not see, that the Lord was about to execute judgments which could not be shunned, without repentance and conversion; indeed they knew neither their duty, nor the rules of the Lord's dealings with them.

10 Therefore [z] will I give their wives unto others, and their fields to them that shall inherit them: [a] for every one from the least even unto the greatest is given to covetousness: [b] from the prophet even unto the priest every one dealeth falsely.

11 For [c] they have healed the hurt of the daughter of my people slightly, saying, Peace, peace; when there is no peace.

12 Were they [d] ashamed when they had committed abomination? nay, they were not at all ashamed, neither could they blush: [e] therefore shall they fall among them that fall: in the time of their visitation they shall be cast down, saith the LORD.

13 ¶ * I will surely consume them, saith the LORD: [f] there shall be no grapes on the vine, nor figs on the fig-tree, and [g] the leaf shall fade; and the things that I have given them shall pass away from them.

14 [h] Why do we sit still? assemble yourselves, [i] and let us enter into the defenced cities, and [k] let us be silent there: for the LORD our God hath put us to silence, and given us [l] water of † gall to drink, because we have sinned against the LORD.

15 We [m] looked for peace, but no good came; and for a time of health, and behold trouble.

16 The snorting of his horses [n] was heard from Dan: [o] the whole land trembled at the sound of the neighing of [p] his strong ones; for they are come, and have devoured the land, and ‡ all that is in it; the city, and those that dwell therein.

17 For, behold, [q] I will send serpents, cockatrices, among you, [r] which will not be charmed, and they shall bite you, saith the LORD.

18 ¶ When I would comfort myself against sorrow, [s] my heart is faint § in me.

§ Heb. upon.

V. 8, 9. (Notes, Rom. ii. 17—23.) The Jews valued themselves upon their superior wisdom and knowledge, and upon having the law of God among them. But what ground had they for such glorying, when they were guilty of the most atrocious idolatry and iniquity? They might as well have been left in ignorance with the poor Gentiles. The Lord had given the law, and the scribes laboured in writing copies of it, and expounding it, to no purpose, if obedience was not rendered to it. Indeed their politicians and counsellors could not prevent the ruin of the state: they would be frustrated in all their devices, put to shame, dismayed, and taken prisoners. For what wisdom could be in such men, as rejected the truths, precepts, and warnings of God's word? 'The title of Scribe, as applied to 'the skill of transcribing or interpreting the law, was first 'given to Ezra;' (that is, according to the order of the sacred books, in our Bibles, for Jeremiah lived long before Ezra;) 'who was not merely a copier of the law, but 'likewise an expounder of the difficulties in it. And it is 'likely none made it their business to write copies of the 'law, but those who were well versed in the study of it; 'which would best secure them from committing mistakes 'in their copies.' (Lowth.) (Notes, xxxvi. 4. Ezra vii. 6—10. Neh. viii. 1—13. Matt. xiii. 51, 52.)

V. 10—12. (Note, vi. 13—15.) The fields would not only be ravaged, and the crops carried off and cattle driven away, but God would give the estates of the Jews to those who would permanently possess them as their own inheritance.

V. 13. This verse may be literally translated, "In "gathering I will consume them, saith JEHOVAH. There "are no grapes on the vine; no figs on the fig-tree; the "very leaf is fallen; and what I gave them shall pass "away." Israel was a vine, or fig-tree: but there was no fruit on the vine, or fig-tree, even the profession of true religion was cast off; and therefore God would take away from the people all the peculiar advantages which he had afforded them. (Notes, Is. v. 1—8. Matt. xxi. 18—20. Luke xiii. 6—9.)

V. 14—16. The Jews are again introduced, conferring together on the report of the Chaldean invasion. They excite one another without delay to leave the villages and lands, that they might take refuge in the defenced cities; and there remain inactive, unless forced to resist by a close siege: for they saw the hand of God in the visitation, and this damped their hopes and enervated their efforts; as he had, for their sins, given them water mingled with gall to drink. This may be considered either as the language of the remnant, who humbled themselves under the afflicting hand of God: or of those that counted him their inexorable enemy, and sat down in sullen despondency. The former had hoped, that their brethren would have joined with them in repentance and prayer, and that the storm would thus have been averted: the latter, through their own presumption and the deception of their false prophets, had expected peace and deliverance, when these desolating judgments came upon them. The snorting of the horses in the Chaldean army being heard in the northern extremity of the land, terror would soon diffuse itself in every place, and speedily be followed by tremendous devastations, not only in the open country, but in Jerusalem itself. This last verse is awfully sublime.

V. 17. The Chaldeans are represented as pestiferous serpents, on account of their motives and conduct in this invasion, and its fatal effects upon the Jews. The invaders were so cruel, subtle, and malicious, and so intent upon the spoil, that they were deaf to all arguments and entreaties; nothing could mollify them, or interrupt their progress, or escape their ravages. (Note, Ps. lviii. 3—5.)

19 [t] Behold, the voice of the cry of the daughter of my people, because of them that dwell in a far country: [u] Is not the LORD in Zion? is not her king in her? [x] Why have they provoked me to anger with their graven images, and with strange vanities?

20 The [y] harvest is past, the summer is ended, and we are not saved.

21 For [z] the hurt of the daughter of my people am I hurt; [a] I am black; astonishment hath taken hold on me.

22 Is there [b] no balm in Gilead? is there [c] no physician there? [d] Why then is not the health of the daughter of my people † recovered?

V. 18, 19. The prophet complains that he was ready to sink under the pressure of his sorrow: he had endeavoured to comfort himself in submission to the will of God; but Jerusalem and her inhabitants, exposed to be plundered and massacred, continually haunted his imagination, and the cries of the sufferers still sounded in his ears. Nay, even before these calamities arrived, the people distressed him by inquiring, whether JEHOVAH did not inhabit Zion? And whether their king were not of David's line, and of God's own appointment? Or whether God himself, the King of Israel, was not in her? (Is. xii. 6.) How then could he leave his city to be profaned and spoiled by idolaters? Would not this dishonour his great name? In answer to this the Lord demands, Why the Jews had renounced his worship, and provoked him to anger with their multiplied idolatries? They had broken the covenant and defiled the city and temple, and his honour required him to execute condign punishment on them. 'The words may be rendered more agreeably to "the Hebrew, thus, "The voice of the cry of the daugh-"ter of my people, from a land afar off." 'So that the 'prophet represents the doleful complaints of the Jews, 'under a state of captivity; as if God had quite forsaken 'and disowned them.' "But why have ye provoked "me?" &c. (Lowth.) The instruction is the same, whether our translation be adhered to, or this adopted.

V. 20. The people seem here to speak. When pressed closely by the siege, they had waited for deliverance in vain. The Egyptians were expected to come to their relief: but the harvest and the summer were past, and they were not delivered, and destruction now stared them in the face.

V. 21, 22. The prophet here sympathized with his people in their troubles, for he was melancholy, disconsolate, and stupified with astonishment. He saw the kingdom like a man expiring of wounds, to which no proper remedy was applied: yet as Gilead produced balm, and there were physicians or surgeons who had skill to use it for healing wounds; so in this case, likewise, effectual relief might be obtained. The Lord was ever ready to deliver his people when they returned to him; his mercy and grace were proposed to all who sought them; and his prophets were sent to exhort and instruct them. Why then did they remain in so hopeless a condition? Because they were set against their only remedy and Physician, and were vainly employed in seeking help in other ways and from other quarters. "I am black," 'I look ghast-'ly, as those that are dying.' 'God had sent his pro-'phets, as so many spiritual physicians; and they had 'given them the best advice: but the fault lay wholly in 'the patients themselves, who refused to submit to their 'prescriptions.' (Lowth.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—12.

The Lord can employ the most ferocious conduct of insulting victors to execute his own righteous purposes: and though no real injury can be done to a dead body, yet when ringleaders in atrocious crimes are disgraced after death, it hath a tendency to impress terror on the minds of survivors: and it affectingly teaches us, that the vengeance of God beyond the grave is most to be dreaded. This will be executed without respect of persons; except as they, who have abused superior talents and done the most mischief, will have the largest share of contempt and misery.—The example even of zealous idolaters may instruct us how we ought to love and serve, to walk with, obey, imitate, seek after, and worship the Lord our God, as our one great privilege, business, and delight. But, as the conduct of mankind is generally the reverse of all this, we need not wonder that his jealous indignation renders them miserable even in this world. Thus many are led to prefer a hopeless death to a joyless life; and then rashly and rebelliously to rush into the presence of their angry Judge, with all their unrepented sins upon their heads, even by the commission of another most horrible crime! But whatever comes upon us here, let us humble ourselves before God, submit to his righteousness, and seek his mercy. Then we shall be enabled to possess our souls in patience, and to wait the appointed season of deliverance; then we shall be willing to live, though afflicted, and yet count it far better to depart hence and be with Christ. But men do not act in the concerns of their souls as in other matters. They fall into sin and suffer for it; they are consumed with terrors; and they are conscious that they are in the road to misery, and not felicity: yet they will use no proper means of escape! Nay, they are affronted by the offer of help or counsel! They rush into dissipation to banish reflection, and strive to forget present sorrows by ensuring severer in future! Thus men depart from God with a perpetual backsliding: when they can get hold of a soothing delusion, either by infidelity, or some false system of religion, they hold fast the deceit and refuse to return. In this way many professors of the gospel turn aside, and their last state is worse than the first. So that after all the warnings and invitations of the sacred oracles, and the present painful effects of men's sins, even the all-penetrating eye of God sees no man disposed of himself to true repentance; but all, as far as let alone, return, even after convictions, to their evil courses, with the most irrational impetuosity. Yet some do speak aright; do examine, judge, and condemn themselves; repent, forsake their sins, and do works meet for repentance: they "work out their "own salvation with fear and trembling; because God

"worketh in them to will, and to do, of his good plea- "sure." If then one thought or desire of escaping the wrath of God be excited in any person's mind, it should be turned into a prayer, that God would give him repentance and his Holy Spirit, that he may be made wise unto salvation. For though many boast of their religious knowledge, and value themselves on being acquainted with the Scriptures, yet, except they be taught by the Spirit of God, the instinct of brutes will prove a surer guide than their supposed wisdom: for such wise men act most foolishly in the most important concerns, and know not aright the truths, precepts, or ordinances of God; they neither profit by the dispensations of Providence, nor prepare for the judgment to come. And when we see how men oppose, neglect, abuse, and despise the Scriptures, we may sometimes be ready to conclude, that they were given in vain, and that preachers and expositors labour to no purpose. Yet whilst many wrest them to their own destruction, others are made wise to salvation; and God will be glorified, even in those who will not profit by his word. But it is an invariable rule, that there is nothing worthy of the name of wisdom in those who reject revelation: and they will soon be ashamed of all systems and devices which they now adopt; they will be dismayed at the approach of those judgments which they now deride; and find themselves caught in a snare, of which they now have no conception. Selfish teachers indeed speak in a more soothing strain, and promise peace when there is no peace; thus men encourage each other in committing abomination without shame or fear; but in the day of visitation their abused plenty will be torn from them, and they will have no refuge to flee to.

V. 13—22.

Happy are they, who by calamities, or any means, are brought to be silent in submission and self-abasement before God: for all who are not thus humbled, will be silenced before his judgment-seat, and made to drink the water of gall for their sins. Whilst transgressors look for peace and prosperity, sudden destruction overtakes them: and there will be no charming, or escaping, the executioners of divine vengeance; no comforting of themselves under these sorrows. But however the servants of God may grieve for the miseries, which they foresee coming upon those whom they love, they will soon be satisfied with the reasons of the divine conduct, and their sorrow will be turned into joy. The justice of God is peculiarly manifested in the punishment of those who deem themselves secured by the engagements of the new covenant and their relation to God, whilst they idolize the world and are slaves to their lusts. As salvation by Christ can only be found in this life, so the present opportunity should be seized; lest at the hour of death, or the day of judgment, any should dolefully exclaim, "The harvest is past, the "summer is ended, and we are not saved." The Lord hath graciously become our Physician; and the blood of Christ and the influences of the Holy Spirit are more effectual to heal the wounded conscience, and the distempered heart, than any medicines to cure the diseases of the body. Why then are sinners not healed? Is there no Saviour, no Sanctifier? Alas! they deem themselves whole, or are in love with their disease, or hate the Physician and his means of cure, or are madly attempting other methods of recovery. Thus they die unpardoned and unchanged, for they will not come to Christ to be saved.

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1, 2. The prophet did not think himself sufficiently affected by the foresight of the miseries that he was sent to predict: he wished to be more evidently impressed and in earnest; and by the excess of his sorrow to show the people his assured belief of what he spake, and his tender love for them, and to affect them by his example. He therefore pathetically exclaimed, 'Oh that one would grant me, that my head were a well 'of waters, and my eyes as fountains, whence tears might 'flow, without intermission, for the calamities which I 'foresee can never be sufficiently lamented.' 'The same 'word in the Hebrew signifies both the eye, and a foun-'tain: as if, in this land of sorrows, our eyes were de-'signed rather for weeping than seeing.' (Henry.)—At the same time the prophet spake with equal energy of his abhorrence of their crimes. "His righteous soul was "vexed day by day with their ungodly deeds," by which God was dishonoured, and vengeance was brought down upon them. He would therefore have preferred some hut in the wilderness, and the life of a hermit, to his present situation, had not his duty made it necessary for him to continue among them. 'The prophet showeth the great 'compassion that he had towards his people: which is a 'special note to discern the true pastors from the hire-'lings.' The word adulterers, may mark either the sensuality or the idolatry of the people, or both combined, which was generally the case.

V. 3—6. The people cultivated the art of lying, as men prepare bows and arrows for war: they habituated their tongues to lies, that they might utter them without hesitation and with confidence: they devised ingenious methods of deception, and strove to get over the restraints of shame and conscience: they were ambitious of being adepts in the whole system of dissimulation, and were continually employed in slander, flattery, cheating, and over-reaching: they were very bold in this work, and sought to obtain authority by these base practices, instead of being valiant for the truths of God, or in maintaining truth and justice in judicial proceedings: they were indefatigable in committing iniquity, and this mutual deceit and fraud were so universal, that the nearest relations and neighbours could not safely trust one another. Whilst the prophet thus complained of his people, the Lord himself spake, and allowed that his servant's dwelling was in the midst of deceit and lies, and that he was on that account despised and hated: but he might be patient in his situation, when he considered, that through the same deceit, the people were resolved not to have any acquaintance with God, and despised him even more than his prophet. They trusted to their lies for safety; they hated the holy perfections, truths, and precepts of God, because contrary to their own character and conduct: they "loved darkness rather "than light, because their deeds were evil;" they preferred any worthless idol and superstition to God and his worship: and their religion was wholly hypocrisy. (8.)

V. 7. In this corrupt state of the whole nation, the only one on earth where the name of God was known and worshipped, what did it behoove him to do? It would have been very dishonourable to him to connive at their wickedness; yet would he not be without a Church on earth; and his engagements to Abraham and David forbade him utterly to cast off the nation, before the coming of the Messiah. He was therefore determined to cast them into the furnace, to melt, prove, and refine the mass; which would be attended with the destruction of vast multitudes, consumed as dross. But it would refine a small number, from whom he would raise up a purer Church for the honour of his name. 'What can I do else for my people; 'but by all means try to save them from the common de-'struction?' (Lowth.)

V. 9. (Notes, v. 9. 29.)

V. 10, 11. (Marg. Ref.) The most dreadful desolations are here predicted with the most exquisite pathos; the prophet being suffused in tears, and unable to repress his groans and bitter lamentations, when compelled to deliver his awful message. "I have not desired the woful "day, LORD, thou knowest."

V. 12. 'Is there none of you so well acquainted with 'the will of God,—as to be able to declare the reasons, 'why he hath given such severe instances of his anger 'against this land?' (Lowth.)

15 Therefore thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Behold, [l] I will feed them, even this people, with wormwood, and give them water of gall to drink.

16 I will [m] scatter them also among the heathen, whom neither they nor their fathers have known: [n] and I will send a sword after them, till I have consumed them.

17 ¶ Thus saith the LORD of hosts, Consider ye, and [o] call for the mourning women, that they may come; and send for cunning women, that they may come:

18 And let them make haste, and take up a wailing for us, that [p] our eyes may run down with tears, and our eyelids gush out with waters.

19 For [q] a voice of wailing is heard out of Zion, How are we spoiled! [r] we are greatly confounded, because we have forsaken the land, because [s] our dwellings have cast us out.

20 Yet [t] hear the word of the LORD, O ye women, and let your ear receive the word of his mouth, and teach your daughters wailing, and every one her neighbour lamentation.

21 For [u] death is come up into our windows, and is entered into our palaces, to cut off the children from without, and the young men from the streets.

22 Speak, Thus saith the LORD, Even the carcases of men shall [x] fall as dung upon the open field, and as the handful after the harvest-man, and none shall gather them.

23 ¶ Thus saith the LORD, [y] Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, [z] neither let the mighty man glory in his might, [a] let not the rich man glory in his riches:

24 But [b] let him that glorieth, glory in this, that he understandeth and [c] knoweth me, that I am the LORD, which exercise [d] loving-kindness, judgment, and righteousness in the earth: [e] for in these things I delight, saith the LORD.

V. 21. Throughout this chapter the prophet speaks of the predicted judgments as actually arrived: and he addresses different descriptions of people, as present at the calamitous scene, that he might affect their minds with the foresight of those terrible judgments which so much affected his own. Thus death is here spoken of as a person that entered by the windows to destroy those who were shut up in the houses and palaces, as well as cutting off the children and young people who were found in the streets.

V. 22. The bodies of the slain would lie as thick on the ground, as the heaps of dung do on the field which the husbandman is manuring; or even as the handfuls of corn and sheaves do, after the reapers: the latter, however, are soon either gathered by the owner, or gleaned by the poor; but the dead bodies of the Jews would be left unburied, to be devoured by the wild beasts and the fowls of the air.

V. 23, 24. Men glory in those things by which they account themselves honourably distinguished from others, and entitled to applause, respect, or admiration; on which they congratulate themselves; which they make the subject of their boastings; and from which they expect safety and felicity. (Marg. Ref.) Thus the Jews were prone to glory in their prudence, policy, valour, strength, or wealth, both as to their national and their personal concerns. But the Lord here solemnly warned them not to glory in these empty distinctions, which at all times were precarious and transient, and could little profit their possessors; but in their case would only expose them very speedily to more complicated miseries, by rendering them the first objects of attention to the rapacious, revengeful, and cruel invaders. But if any of them were disposed to glory, let him see to it that he possessed a really valuable and honourable distinction, and ground of self-congratulation and confidence. This no man could have, but he who knew the Lord, and by faith had become acquainted with his glorious perfections, and the methods of his dealings with mankind. (Note, 1 Chr. xxviii. 9.) nour and felicity. As God is thus known to sinners only in and through Christ, the apostle applies this passage in its genuine meaning, when he speaks of believers glorying in him and his salvation. (Note, 1 Cor. i. 26—31.)

V. 25, 26. The Jews were prone to glory and confide in the external sign of circumcision: but the Lord here assures them, that he would entirely disregard this distinction, in the judgments to be inflicted on the nations by the Chaldeans. Accordingly Judah seems purposely to be named betwixt Egypt and Edom, as no more entitled to the special benefits vouchsafed the people of God than those nations; because of the uncircumcision of their hearts and their utter want of faith and love to him. (Notes, Gen. xvii. 9—12. Lev. xxvi. 21, 22. Deut. xxx. 1—10. Rom. ii. 28, 29.) 'The marginal reading is to be 'preferred.' "They that have the corners of their hair "polled." 'The expression denotes those Arabians who 'cut their hair on the forepart of their heads round, and let 'the hair grow long behind.' (Lev. xix. 27.) (Lowth.) The Septuagint, instead of Judah, read Idumea, though Edom, another name for the same people, follows directly! It seems the translators were unwilling to have Judah introduced in this connexion.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—9.

If ministers would have the people deeply affected by their representations of the evil and fatal consequences of sin, their conduct must manifest that their own hearts are suitably impressed with the subject, as well as full of tender sympathy with them in their sufferings; thus showing that their severe rebukes and awful warnings spring from love, and not from resentment or moroseness. But they who most lament the miseries that are coming on the wicked, are sensible that they ought to be more affected: and if they could weep over them day and night, it would not exceed the cause of sorrow, and would give emphasis to their exhortations and expostulations. Nay, the state of this world always suggests matter of lementation; and a compassionate heart is ready to take up a weeping and wailing continually, for the havoc made among the human species by wars, famines, pestilences, and other judgments, with which God visits guilty nations, turns cities into heaps, and desolates the countries. Yet we must adore the divine justice and acquiesce in the divine will, and what we see, hear, and discover, by careful investigation of the conduct of mankind, even where favoured with revelation, will serve to explain these mysteries of Providence. Such scenes would also render us weary of human society, and lead us to prefer a lodging place in the wilderness, were we not conscious that we must carry along with us, in our own hearts, an epitome of this wicked world; and that the powers of darkness have access to us in every retirement. Even the desert would certainly be the scene of horrid temptations, abominable imaginations, and vile affections, without communion with God through Jesus Christ, and the influences of the Holy Spirit: and with these, we may live in purity and peace amidst the wickedness of populous cities. Yet the more holy any man is, the more painful will it be for him to witness the impiety and wickedness of mankind: and when ministers see no success attend their labours, it is not wonderful that they wish to leave them. They are men of like passions with others: continual disappointment in the leading desire of their hearts is very painful; they cannot but feel the contempt and ill treatment, which they meet with for their plain-dealing; and, though preserved from resentment, they must be grieved to be always giving offence and rendering themselves obnoxious. It also distresses them to recollect, that they must prove the occasion of increasing the condemnation of those whose salvation they long after. But whilst it is proper for them to express very strongly their sentiments on these subjects, it is generally best for them to abide in their place and work, and to leave the event with God. If their lot is cast where deceit and wickedness abound, they should protest against these by their example and their preaching: and in reproving sin, it is necessary to mention particulars even in the detail, that their hearers may know themselves to be the persons concerned; whether they be living in adultery or dishonesty, in avarice or malice. Whilst all men are offended at the imputation of being liars, all, in one way or other, have been guilty of lying; and multitudes use their tongues almost wholly for this purpose. The whole social intercourse of thousands and millions is a mere interchange of dissimulation: now they lavish deceitful compliments, professions, and panegyrics; and shortly they deviate as widely from the truth in slander and back-biting, and perhaps in respect of the very same persons. In trade a similar system of falsehood is prevalent; and buying and selling are often conducted by the same interchange of deceit as visiting and conversation, but with still more atrocious iniquity. In short, men are every where seeking to accomplish their selfish designs by concealing them, and to prey on one another by fair professions and with smiling countenances: and as nothing is so prolific as lies, they proceed from evil to evil; wander more and more from God and truth; and employ all their ingenuity, industry, and even intrepidity, in venturing upon daring schemes of deception. So that there is need for every one to take heed of his neighbour, and to be cautious how he trusts even the nearest relation; lest he should be supplanted and circumvented. But whilst men thus lay in wait for their neighbours, Satan takes their souls in his snare, and God gives them over to strong delusions: the state of their hearts indisposes them for true religion: if they pretend to any, they are mere hypocrites; "not liking to retain God in their knowledge," they are left to some foolish scheme of superstition, enthusiasm, or skepticism; and so become perhaps the instruments of the devil, in propagating and strenuously contending for lies, instead of being valiant for the truth upon the earth. But however corrupt any part of the visible church may become; or however God may visit, and avenge himself on guilty nations who are called by his name, he will always have a people upon earth. And he will either utterly cast off professing churches, that become thus corrupt: or he will melt and try them; and putting away numbers as dross, he will bring forth a few as vessels of honour fitted for his use.

V. 9—26.

When the judgments of God are abroad in the earth, they, who are indeed wise, and understand such matters, and have heard and believed his word, will perceive for what reason he causes such calamities. And surely it behooves the Jews, who have been so long scattered among the nations, and consumed by a succession of calamities, to inquire, "Wherefore the LORD hath thus fed them with "wormwood, and given them water of gall to drink?" Must it not be obvious, that it is because they have forsaken his law, and not obeyed his voice; but followed their own imaginations and the traditions of their fathers, in contempt of the Messiah, the Prince of peace, and the King of Israel? It avails little to multiply expressions of sorrow or to excite each other to lamentation, when death enters our houses or desolates our streets; except we obey the word of the Lord, and mourn with "godly sorrow, "that worketh repentance unto salvation not to be repented "of." This, and this alone, can prepare the heart for true comfort, and convert the heaviest afflictions into the most precious mercies. But in this world of sin and sorrow, terminating speedily in death and future judgment, how unreasonable is it for men to glory in their learning, knowledge, sagacity, health, strength, authority, wealth, or any other appendage, which leaves them under the dominion of sin and the wrath of God! which cannot avert temporal or eternal misery! which may be torn from them in a moment, and of which an account must hereafter be rendered! which, instead of rendering them happy, may probably increase their eternal condemnation! Happy is he who knoweth God by true faith and the experience of his mercy and grace in Jesus Christ; who beholdeth his glory, and is changed into his image; who is a follower of him in his loving kindness, judgment, and righteousness: and who delights in those things in which God delighteth! This is the true "circumcision of the "heart, whose praise is not of men, but of God." Such men are the true Israel, "who worship God in the Spirit, "glory in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the "flesh." Let us then prize this distinction, which is divine and eternal. Let us seek for it diligently, and then rejoice and glory in it above all other things: let us so value ourselves upon it as to be above grovelling pursuits, and to deem ourselves set apart for the glory of God our Saviour; and to him let us devote all our possessions and endowments, that he may be honoured in our use of them. —But the time is coming, when the uncircumcised in heart, notwithstanding external forms and notions, will, with the heathens and infidels, be punished with an everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord.

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 2. The people of Israel, when in their own land, had always been disposed to learn the idolatries and superstitions of their neighbours: the ten tribes were dispersed in heathen countries, and the Jews were about to be carried captive to Babylon, the very centre of idolatry. The Gentiles in general, and the Chaldeans above all others, were addicted to astrology and to regard omens; they were dismayed by comets, eclipses, and other unusual appearances of the heavenly bodies; and their determinations in the most important matters were often formed from such signs of the heavens, rather than from sound policy. This was the effect of ignorance of God, of idolatrous regard to his creatures, and of vain endeavours to pry into futurity; and therefore the Lord's people must not imitate their customs. Whatever might seem to be portended by the signs of the heavens, they would be safe while trusting in God and walking in the path of duty; and nothing could truly presage prosperity to them in the way of disobedience,

V. 6—8. The prophet here contrasts the glory of Israel's God with the impotency of senseless idols, in an act of solemn worship addressed to them; that by interweaving adorations with his instructions, the people might be led to concur in this holy service. None of the pretended deities, which some professed to worship by their images, could be equalled to JEHOVAH: they were either inanimate creatures, or the departed spirits of eminent men, or ideal characters, or devils. Nor could any of the wise legislators, philosophers, or rulers of the nations, vie with the Lord the King of all nations. Who then would refuse to fear and worship him, whose infinite perfection, and absolute, universal, and everlasting sovereignty over all creatures, which are the works of his hands and wholly dependent on him; and whose power to save and to destroy, entitle him to this honour, and make it reasonable and advantageous to all rational creatures? Idolaters therefore must be altogether brutish and foolish; and the worship of a senseless block of wood, (however carved or ornamented, or whatever it was supposed to represent,) must lead to the most unworthy apprehensions of God, to the most gross and pernicious mistakes, and to all vain and abominable practices. (10.)

V. 9, 10. Some think that Uphaz is the same as Ophir: but this is quite uncertain.—The contrast between the most expensive and most richly ornamented dead images and the living and true God, the everlasting King, whose wrath the nations could not abide, is very expressive and instructive.—Where but in the Scriptures do we meet with such sublime and rational thoughts concerning the great Creator and Lord of all? The very circumstance that the Bible (and the Bible alone,) has established the doctrine of one God of infinite perfection, to the exclusion of all others who have been or are called God, or have been or are worshipped, is a very convincing argument to a considerate mind, that it is the word of that One living and true God.

V. 11. This verse, in the original, is in the Chaldee, and not the Hebrew language; and it seems to have been thus inserted, that the captive Jews might have an answer ready for the idolaters, in their own language, when they tempted them to join their worship. Their idols were no gods, they had not created the world, and they would shortly be destroyed from the earth. This is a prediction of the total extirpation of idolatry, which hath already received a most wonderful accomplishment, and will be perfectly fulfilled, when that ambitious spirit, whom all idolaters worship, shall be confined in the bottomless pit. —'Lest they should think they had acquitted themselves 'well, if they abstained from what they saw the heathen 'do; he tells them, that they must do yet more than this. 'They must make open profession against their gods; 'they must proclaim against their idolatry: and therefore 'in the middle of his exhortation, he interlaceth these 'words in the Chaldee tongue.'—'Can every friar in a 'pulpit—warrant his words from being mistaken or per-'verted to heresy? And are the words—of God so ob-'noxious that they may not be read?'—'If God himself 'may not speak in a vulgar tongue; I see far less reason 'why a friar should.'—'Ye have heard the state of the 'times, wherein this prophecy is commanded; now let us 'consider of the event.—We have heard—of the admired 'oracles of the Gentiles, of Apollo at Delphos, and of 'Jupiter Ammon in Egypt:—but all of them have long 'since perished from the earth, and from under these 'heavens.—We have heard of the names of many gods in 'former times of great renown in these islands of the 'Gentiles; Jupiter, Mars, Apollo, &c.:—yet they are all 'perished.—Where now is Bel the god of Babylon, 'Nisroch the god of Assyria, Baal and Asteroth the gods 'of the Zidonians,—Milcom the god of the Ammonites, 'Chemosh of Moab, and Thammus of the Egyptians?—'their very names are perished.' V. 12—15. Here again the almighty and all-wise Creator and Upholder of the universe, the great Disposer of all events, who giveth rain from heaven and fruitful seasons, and ordereth the whole in judgment and mercy, is contrasted with the senseless, lifeless idol, in a manner exquisitely suited to shame the idolaters. 'The more any 'man thinketh to do any thing well by his own wisdom, 'and not as God instructeth him, the more doth he prove 'himself to be a vile beast.' "The time of their visita- "tion" means, the time appointed by the only wise God for punishing the idolaters, and pouring contempt on the idols.

V. 16. The Lord himself was Jacob's Portion; and he was not at all like the worthless idols, that were the portion of the heathen: for he is the Former, or Creator, of all things, and was before all things. His infinite sufficiency is the riches of his people; his wisdom chooses, and his power effects, their felicity; his truth engages to and his bounty bestows upon, them whatever can conduce to their good; and he is their great Protector, "the LORD of "hosts," or armies, "is his name." The nation of Israel typified this people of God; and as far as they lived up to their privileges, they possessed this happiness, and needed not to seek help from idols. In his disposal of the nations, JEHOVAH had taken them as his inheritance: his worship was established among them, his revenue of honour from fallen man was chiefly collected from them, and his peculiar delight was in them; whilst other nations were left to the worship and service of Satan.

V. 17, 18. Here the siege and destruction of Jerusalem are again predicted. Her inhabitants are called on to collect their treasures from the country, within the walls of the city which they inhabited: yet this would not secure either them or their property: for they would at once and altogether be violently driven out of the land; and the Lord would make them feel the bitter effects of their sins, and the truth of his despised predictions, in their deep distress.

V. 19—22. The prophet here sympathizes with his country, and bewails its calamities. The wound which had been inflicted was indeed very grievous, and greatly to be deplored: but it was unavoidable, and must be patiently endured, as the righteous appointment of God. 'Thus he showeth the people how to behave themselves.' —The city and temple were plundered and destroyed, like the removal of a tent: the children of his people were slain or carried captive; so that none remained to rebuild their ruins. For the pastors (both rulers and teachers,) were become brutish in their conduct, neglecting every duty to God and man; and thus they had occasioned the flock to be scattered, and the cities of Judah to be turned into a desert, where dragons, or serpents abide. The clause, "they shall not prosper," is rendered in the old translation, "they have no understanding:" as they would not seek the Lord, they were judicially infatuated. "The "noise of the bruit, &c." (an obsolete word, signifying a report;) means an alarming rumour, circulated in a loud and earnest manner, that the Chaldeans had entered the northern part of the land, and were marching directly to Judea.

V. 23—25. By thus addressing God, the prophet taught the people in what light to view their calamities, and how to pray respecting them. 'He speaketh this, 'because that Nebuchadnezzar purposed to have made

CHAP. XI.

The prophet is sent to proclaim God's covenant, and to reprove the Jews for breaking it, 1—10. He denounces vengeance against them, 11—17: and against the men of Anathoth, who devised his death, 18—23.

'war against the Moabites and Ammonites; but hearing 'of Zedekiah's rebellion, he turned his power against 'Jerusalem.' In this enterprise he had been guided and prospered by the Lord himself, who employed him to punish his rebellious people; "Howbeit he meant not so." —His hand must therefore be acknowledged and his justice submitted to, in these afflictive dispensations. In like manner the counsels and devices of the people would not accomplish their own purposes, but the decrees of God: nor would they ever be led back into the right way by their own natural willingness, wisdom, or strength; and therefore the case must be referred to the Lord, with prayer that he would guide and set them right. The prophet next deprecates from his people that anger of God, which would destroy them; and prays that their corrections might so be moderated by his fatherly wisdom and love, that they might tend to their good; (Marg. Ref.) and that his vindictive fury might be averted from Israel, and poured out upon the heathen nations, especially such as had devoured and desolated Jacob his people. (Note, Psalm lxxix. 6, 7.)—The last clause is literally, 'They have eaten Jacob, yea, 'they have eaten him and consumed him, &c.'

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16.

Man's apostacy from God hath made way for his being so deluded and enslaved by Satan, as to be capable of the greatest absurdities under the notion of religion: and these soon become the customs of whole nations, who join together in worshipping a lifeless block, which cannot possibly do them either good or harm! Nothing but revelation hath prevented this degrading folly from becoming universal; this appears, not only from the very general prevalence of idolatry, but from the strange propensity which the worshippers of God have ever shown to learn the ways of the heathen, and to turn aside to pagan idolatries and superstitions. Even in those Christian countries, where images and other vain pageantries no longer disgrace their worship, the regard paid by multitudes to the signs of the heavens, to charms, to predictions, to lucky days, lucky numbers, good or bad omens, &c. &c. and all that fear of some unknown invisible power, which in one way or other is supposed to act independently of God, strangely prevails! and is evidently copied from the vain customs of the heathen, but is far more criminal in us than in them. But they who do not fear God, are always liable to be dismayed without cause: whilst such as reverence his majesty, dread his anger, seek his favour, worship his name, and walk in his ways, need not fear either the powers on earth or the powers of hell. For there is none like unto JEHOVAH, who is great in might, the King of nations, and the Lord of all. To him all worship and honour appertain; and all will serve and fear him, who are not foolish and brutish: for he is the true, living, and eternal God; and his wrath not only makes the earth to tremble, and overwhelms the nations, but he is able to destroy body and soul in hell. Let sinners then forsake the company of his enemies, and join that of his reconciled people. He hath a right to our devoted service as our great Creator; his wisdom contrived the glorious fabric of the universe; his power completed the grand design; in his knowledge and discretion he hath established it hitherto. His command continues the course of the seasons, and the variations of the weather; the tremendous voice of his thunder, and the lightnings which attend his fertilizing rain, and the tempestuous winds which he bringeth out of his treasures, show him to be the Author of all our mercies, and warn us not to abuse them, nor to forget the Giver. But though we all have, for our rebellion and ingratitude, deserved his indignation; yet he is ready to forgive and save all who repent and believe in the name of his Son Jesus Christ; and thus sinners become a part of his valued inheritance, and he becomes their unchangeable Friend and all-sufficient Portion. These blessed truths faith learns from the word of God; but all other sources of instruction lead to doctrines of vanity: and all idols and idolaters, of every kind, will perish in the time of God's visitation.

V. 17—25.

We are continually warned to beware of mere profession. No place is so sacred, or so fortified, as to secure the workers of iniquity: and they who do not believe that God will execute his awful threatenings, will "find it "so," when their wound will be more grievous than they can now conceive. A gracious resignation indeed will support the believer under every grief, that the Lord may allot him: but what can render the load of divine vengeance tolerable to those who fall under it in sullen despair? Alas, that ever the pastors of God's Church should become so brutish, as to be given up to the pursuit of carnal interests and pleasures, to the neglect of him and his service! such men cannot prosper themselves; and their misconduct not only scatters their flocks, but brings down divine judgments upon guilty nations. But the way of man is not in himself: if the Lord has directed our steps into the ways of peace and righteousness, let us continually entreat him to enable us still to walk in them, and to hold up our goings, that we slip not; and let us lift up our prayer for others, that they may be guided and directed in the same path. If even severe corrections lead sinners to a conviction of these salutary truths, they will have abundant cause for gratitude; they will then humble themselves before God, and seek his guidance and assistance; they will submit to his correcting rod, and only deprecate the destroying sword of his avenging justice; and they will no longer remain under the condemnation of those nations, families, or individuals, who call not upon the name of the Lord. But whilst he visits the offences of his people with sharp corrections, and destroys hypocrites, his hot displeasure will be poured out on those that have not known and worshipped him, and especially on the persecutors of his chosen people.

THE word that came to Jeremiah from the LORD, saying,

2 Hear ye the words of [a] this covenant, and speak unto the men of Judah, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem;

3 And say thou unto them, Thus saith the LORD God of Israel; [b] Cursed be the man that obeyeth not the words of this covenant,

4 Which [c] I commanded your fathers in the day that I brought them forth out of the land of Egypt, from the [d] iron furnace, saying, [e] Obey my voice, and do them, according to all which I command you: so shall [f] ye be my people, and I will be your God:

5 That I may [g] perform the oath which I have sworn unto your fathers, to give them a land flowing with milk and honey, as it is this day. Then answered I, and said, * So be it, O LORD.

6 Then the LORD said unto me, [h] Proclaim all these words in the cities of Judah, and in the streets of Jerusalem, saying, Hear ye the words of this covenant, and [i] do them.

7 For [k] I earnestly protested unto your fathers, [l] in the day that I brought them up out of the land of Egypt, even unto this day, rising early and protesting, saying, Obey my voice.

8 Yet they [m] obeyed not, nor inclined their ear, but walked every one in the † imagination of their evil heart: [n] therefore I will bring upon them all the words of this covenant, which I commanded them to do; but they did them not.

9 And the LORD said unto me, [o] A conspiracy is found among the men of Judah, and among the inhabitants of Jerusalem.

10 They are [p] turned back to [q] the iniquities of their forefathers, which refused to hear my words; and they went after other gods to serve them: [r] the house of Israel, and the house of Judah have broken my covenant which I made with their fathers.

11 Therefore, thus saith the LORD, Behold, [s] I will bring evil upon them, [t] which they shall not be able to ‡ escape; and though [u] they shall cry unto me, I will not hearken unto them.

12 Then shall the cities of Judah and inhabitants of Jerusalem [x] go, and cry unto the gods unto whom they offer incense: but they shall not save them at all in the time of their ◊ trouble.

13 For [y] according to the number of thy cities were thy gods, O Judah; and according to the number of the streets of Jerusalem have ye set up [z] altars to that ‖ shameful thing, even altars to burn incense unto Baal.

NOTES.

CHAP. XI. V. 2—8. The orders are here given in the plural number, "Hear ye," &c.; to Jeremiah, as one of many who had been charged with the same message: and they refer to the national covenant made with Israel at mount Sinai: (Notes, &c. Ex. xix. xxiv. Deut. xxvii. xxviii. xxix.) This was the charter of all Israel's privileges, as long as they were obedient according to the terms of it. But idolatry and apostacy from God, when general, and committed or connived at by public authority, forfeited the covenant. The prophet was therefore sent to remind the people of the curses denounced in the law against the rebellious; and to show that the continuance of the benefits covenanted to them, when they were delivered from Egyptian bondage, depended on their obedience. Whilst the Lord charged him with this message, and mentioned the good land given them, he answered and said "Amen," or "So be it, O LORD;" as expressing his acquiescence in this reasonable requirement, (Notes, Deut. xxvii. 25, &c.) and his hearty desire, that the people might return to obedience, and be continued in their privileges. He was then ordered to proclaim the covenant very publicly; to show the people how their fathers had broken it; to predict the speedy approach of the calamities threatened in it; and to charge the whole nation with having conspired together to forsake God, and give themselves up to idolatry. Some think that the prophet also reminded the people of the renewal of the covenant, lately made during the reign of Josiah. (Marg. Ref.) 'The use of an iron furnace is to 'melt and purify metals, and it is an apt representation of 'sore afflictions.' (Lowth.)

V. 9, 10. 'They made some steps towards a reformation in the time of Josiah; but now they have conspired together to return back to their former idolatries.' (Lowth.)

V. 11, 12. (Marg. Ref.) 'I will not hearken to 'them, because they will not pray with true faith and 'repentance; but for the smart and grief which they feel.' —So that not receiving a favourable answer from God, they again turned to their idols, and sought help from them; as Saul, when God did not answer him, consulted the witch: and with similar success.

V. 13. (Marg. Ref.) 'Besheth, shame, was a nick-'name for Baal. So Jerubbaal is called Jerub-besheth, '2 Sam. xi. 21.' (Lowth.) (Note, Judg. vi. 31, 32.)

14 Therefore [a] pray not thou for this people, neither lift up a cry or prayer for them: [b] for I will not hear them in the time that they cry unto me for their * trouble.

15 † What hath [c] my beloved [d] to do in mine house, [e] seeing she hath wrought lewdness with many, and [f] the holy flesh is passed from thee? ‡ when thou doest evil, [g] then thou rejoicest.

16 The LORD called thy name, [h] A green olive-tree, fair, and of goodly fruit: [i] with the noise of a great tumult he hath kindled fire upon it, and the branches of it are broken.

17 For the LORD of hosts, [k] that planted thee, hath [l] pronounced evil against thee, for the evil of the house of Israel and of the house of Judah, which they have done against themselves, to provoke me to anger, in offering incense unto Baal.

18 ¶ And [m] the LORD hath given me knowledge of it, and I know it: then thou shewedst me their doings.

19 But [n] I was like a lamb, or an ox that is brought to the slaughter; and I knew not that [o] they had devised devices against me, saying, Let us destroy § the tree with the fruit thereof, [p] and let us cut him off [q] from the land of the living, [r] that his name may be no more remembered.

20 But, O LORD of hosts, [s] that judgest righteously, [t] that triest the reins and the heart, [u] let me see thy vengeance on them: for unto thee have I [x] revealed my cause.

21 Therefore thus saith the LORD, of the men of Anathoth, [y] that seek thy life, saying, [z] Prophesy not in the name of the LORD, that [a] thou die not by our hand:

22 Therefore thus saith the LORD of hosts, Behold, I will ‖ punish them: [b] the young men shall die by the sword; their sons and their daughters shall die by famine:

23 And there shall be [c] no remnant of them: for I will bring evil upon the men of Anathoth, even [d] the year of their visitation.

V. 14. (Note, vii. 16.)

V. 15. God had always treated Israel as his beloved, and had still mercy in reserve for the nation. He had espoused them by the Sinai covenant: and they vainly deemed themselves his favourite people, and still came to his temple. But what had the spouse to do in the house of her husband, after all her shameless adulteries? She was now about to be divorced, and turned out of doors. The Jews would soon be driven from the city and temple; the holy flesh of their sacrifices, which was burned upon the altar or feasted on in the courts of the Lord, would cease from among them; for God abhorred their oblations, seeing they rejoiced in iniquity.

V. 16. (Notes, Rom. xi. 16—24.) The Lord had planted Israel in Canaan, as a good olive-tree in a rich soil: he had made the nation very prosperous, and afforded them every advantage for fruitfulness; and once they were fruitful, and he called the nation "a green olive-tree, fair "and of goodly fruit," &c. But they were now so degenerated, that he was determined to consume them, as with fire, by means of the tumultuous and furious Chaldean invaders.

V. 17. (Note, ii. 20, 21.)

V. 18—23. Whilst the prophet was earnestly seeking the good of his people, a conspiracy was formed against his life. His brethren, the priests, of his own city Anathoth, were the ringleaders in this combination. They could not endure his faithful warnings and reproofs: they hated the man and his communications, and were determined either to silence or to slay him, that he and his predictions might be forgotten together. But before they had brought their matters to bear, the Lord discovered their devices to his prophet, and probably directed him how to frustrate them. Upon this he speaks, as one in amazement: he had done nothing to merit this treatment from them; and had never suspected them, any more than the lamb, or ox, suspects danger when led to the slaughter.—He then appeals for his innocence to God, who knoweth what passes in the inmost recesses of the heart, and refers his cause to him, and he was in consequence instructed to denounce vengeance on them, root and branch; so that no remnant should be left of them in the approaching season of visitation.—The words, rendered "Let me see thy "vengeance on them," are literally, "I shall see thy "vengeance on them." 'I foresee it, and predict it, 'though I deplore it.' This is one out of many instances, in which, I apprehend, an undue regard to the Septuagint has induced our venerable translators needlessly to introduce the sacred writers as uttering imprecations, rather than predictions, against their persecutors. It cannot be denied, that their predictions sometimes must be rendered as imprecations; but this should not be done, when the words may literally be otherwise translated.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Not only did the covenant of works, and Israel's national covenant, denounce curses on those who obeyed not: but the very Gospel threatens even severer vengeance on those who refuse obedience to the divine Redeemer. So that no man can be saved, who doth not obey the command of God to repent, to believe in Christ, to separate from sin and the world, to deny himself, and to walk in newness of life. Indeed, it is absurd to suppose that a God of unchangeable holiness should, under any dispensation, authorize rebellion and ingratitude. Still he earnestly protests to all men, saying, "Obey my voice;" and commands his ministers most publicly to make known his words; and especially to charge "all, that name the name of Christ, "to depart from iniquity." But, alas, how few do thus obey! In general men cry, "Lord, Lord, but do not the "things which he says." They will hearken to his ministers, whilst they speak of doctrines, promises, and privileges: but when duties are mentioned, they will not incline their ear, but walk every man in the imagination of his evil heart. And professed Christians in general seem to have conspired together to run down strict holy walking with God; to return back to the iniquities of their heathen ancestors; and to copy after those who have refused to hear the commandments of God. But as the law is not written in the hearts of such men, their sins are not forgiven: and the curses of the Bible belong to them, and nothing else. Evil is coming upon them, which they cannot escape: if they now remain impenitent, their extorted cries for mercy will at last be disregarded; and they will be left to seek help from their idolized lusts and possessions: their shameful practices will be exposed; and they will find that even the prayers of despised ministers for their conversion, having returned into their own bosom, will only tend to aggravate their condemnation. They may glory in their relation to God, as his beloved, and presume that all the privileges of his covenant are their own: but whilst they rejoice in iniquity, they only profane God's ordinances here, and have nothing to do in his holy habitation in heaven. For when the olive trees and fig trees, that have been planted in this vineyard, remain unfruitful; though they be luxuriant in foliage and of promising appearance; yet they shall surely be cut down, and cast into the fire. But they who venture thus to address presumptuous professors, must expect to be hated for their faithfulness; how much soever they weep over and pray for them, or spend themselves in labouring for their good. Though they be harmless and gentle as the lamb, and patient and laborious as the ox, and devoid of guile and suspicion, they will be persecuted, (instead of highly esteemed,) for their work's sake: for such men as crucified the holy Lamb of God, will always abhor those who rebuke and warn them as he did: and they would put them to death also, if they had it in their power, and if they could no otherwise silence them; for they want to destroy their reprovers, that they may no more remember, or be tormented by, their faithful testimony. But the Lord knoweth, and can protect his servants against all the devices of persecutors: and he will certainly plead their cause, and execute vengeance on their enemies. In every age of the Church, ungodly priests have been ringleaders in this diabolical work; a man's foes are often those of his own household; and a prophet will be sure to be most without honour in his own country. When the Lord by any means discovers to us the enmity and devices of our opposers, we shall find it a peculiar comfort to be able to appeal to him, as the heart-searching and righteous Judge, that we suffer for well-doing, and not for evil doing: and we should reveal our cause, and refer the whole matter to him. But we should also look well to our spirits, that we be not overcome with evil; but that, by patient continuance in praying for our enemies, and showing them kindness, we may, if possible, overcome evil with good.

NOTES.

CHAP. XII. V. 1—4. The prophet's discomposure, on account of the conspiracy formed against him, led him into a perplexity about the prosperity of the ringleaders in iniquity, among whom he probably numbered the men of Anathoth to be the principal. He also thought that judgments inflicted on them might prevent the ruin of the nation: and he resolved to pour out his heart before God on this subject. He allowed that the Lord was righteous in his most mysterious judgments: yet he entreated him to show the reasons of his conduct, and why he suffered such treacherous men, as cloaked their inward iniquitous devices with a profession of piety, to prosper in their families, circumstances, and undertakings. He could with confidence appeal to the heart-searching God that he acted uprightly; and that he was hated and persecuted for his sake: and he therefore prayed that these principal transgressors might be singled out for punishment, as sheep are for the slaughter; that a check being thus given to the growth of wickedness, and a sacrifice as it were made to divine justice, the drought under which the land laboured might be terminated. These presumptuous criminals had said, that the prophet "should not see their last end:" that is, they were confident that the judgments which he predicted would not be executed: and they had determined to compass his death, and thus prevent him from seeing whether they would or not.

V. 5, 6. The Lord seems here gently to have reproved the prophet's impatience. The opposition of the men of Anathoth was not so formidable as what he must expect to encounter from the kings and rulers of Judah; and the present calamities of the nation were trivial, compared with the approaching desolations: if then he was so disconcerted by these lighter trials, how would he endure more severe afflictions? If he were so wearied with running with footmen, or contending with his equals, how would he run with horsemen, or execute his office in defiance of those in authority? If he could scarcely endure, when the land (in which he too confidently had expected safety,) remained in peace, what would he do, when hostile invasions would bear down all before them, like the overflowing waters of Jordan? And as his nearest relations, even such as were nearer to him than the rest of the men of Anathoth, and whom he probably supposed to be unconcerned in the conspiracy, would fiercely combine against him, and excite the multitude to assault him; so he must expect opposition from every quarter, and prepare for it: and he ought not to trust even those who spake most friendly to him.

V. 7—9. The Lord next condescended to explain his intentions, and the reasons of his conduct, to his discouraged servant. He was determined to forsake his temple, and to give up his heritage, (which he had so long treated with peculiar kindness,) into the hands of his enemies. For his people were become outrageous and rapacious as lions; they openly quarrelled with his appointments and requirements; and because they could not reach Him, they showed their enmity by murdering his prophets! This was the general character of the nation, and therefore the Lord abhorred them. Nay, they were become as a speckled bird: they had collected together all the abominations of the surrounding kingdoms, and combined them together, with the worship of JEHOVAH, into one motley mixture of idolatry and superstition. Therefore the nations should be let loose against them, to punish them for borrowing their idolatries; and as wild beasts to devour them.

V. 10—13. The captains of Nebuchadnezzar's army were the many pastors here intended: they came, as shepherds with their flocks, to devour and tread down Judah and Jerusalem, (the Lord's vineyard, whose hedge he had broken down,) and when this pleasant portion should be desolated, it would mourn unto him; the very ruins of the city and temple would, as it were, mournfully cry for redress; and the captive Jews would repent of their sins, and seek deliverance. But till these judgments were actually inflicted, none of the people would lay either these denunciations or any preceding corrections to heart. The Chaldean spoilers therefore would come through the wilderness, to destroy Jerusalem, and all other fortified places; for the Lord would use them as his sword to destroy the whole land, and to take away peace from every inhabitant: all the methods that would be taken for relief, though laborious and expensive, would resemble the sowing of wheat and the reaping of thorns or thistles; and they would be ashamed, when they saw the wretched effects of all their devices and efforts.

V. 14—17. The Jews had deserved their calamities from God: but the neighbouring nations injuriously invaded and spoiled them, out of hatred to the Lord and his worship; and because they coveted the land which he had allotted them: and therefore he would plead their cause against his evil neighbours; and both execute judgments on them, and reinstate Judah in his own land. (Marg. Ref.) And yet he would afterwards show mercy to those nations, and give them the quiet possession of the countries that were assigned them: nay, he meant to admit them into his Church, and to all the privileges of his people, when they were disposed to learn his true religion, as they had formerly taught the Israelites their idolatries.—(Note, iv. 2.) This evidently implies a prediction of the incorporation of the Jews and Gentiles in the Christian Church; and looks forward to those times when the fulness of the Gentiles shall come in; and when all nations will be destroyed, that persist in their opposition to the cause of Christ. 'Those that will not have God and 'Christ to reign over them, shall in the end be punished 'with everlasting destruction.' (Lowth.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord allows his people to spread their perplexities before him, and humbly to plead with him concerning his judgments: but he expects it to be always taken for granted, that "he is righteous in all his ways and holy in "all his works." The success of the wicked, and especially that of persecutors and deceivers, who oppose the cause of God; terrify or seduce multitudes into impiety, infidelity, or hypocrisy; and bring down judgments on Churches and nations; is very embarrassing to the pious mind. Yet the Lord never permits such men to prosper; except it be for the salutary trial or correction of his people, or for just judgments on those who hate his truths and precepts; and they who are spared to be executioners of wrath on others, and "to treasure up wrath for them-"selves," should not be called happy! For if they be planted, and take root and bear fruit, it is unto death and condemnation. But it is not easy in such trying circumstances to avoid every degree of impatience; even when the Lord himself may safely be appealed to for our integrity, and when the hypocrisy of our opponents is most evident. Our grief for the prevalence of iniquity is often leavened with peevishness, on account of the trials which it occasions us: and our zeal for the honour of God, our abhorrence of sin, and even our love to the Church and nation to which we belong, are often mingled with an undue regard to our own credit, and with bitterness against our opposers. We ought then, on such occasions, to watch our hearts, and to bridle our tongues, that we may not speak or act unadvisedly, and in our own spirit. Should the Lord see any of us, in this our favoured day, fretful or desponding under our trifling difficulties, he might sharply and properly reprove us, as he did his servant of old: we should therefore judge ourselves, and consider how we should behave, if, instead of our trials, we were called to sufferings like those of the prophets, apostles, and martyrs of other ages. And thus our minds would be quieted in submission and gratitude. We ought not, however, to trust in our land of peace, for we know not what overwhelming calamities await us; we are sure that, if we be faithful in the cause of truth and holiness, the wicked, though nearly related, will hate us, and we must expect treachery cloaked with fair words: we should then prepare for trials and count our cost; and we may well question our own faithfulness, if all go smooth with us in this evil world. But none will be so inveterate against the faithful servant of God, as those who presume themselves to be his chief favourites, merely because they have enjoyed and abused peculiar advantages. Such men count every privilege their own by a title which nothing can forfeit, and as they are ready to complain of the Lord when he crosses them in providence, so they are enraged at his ministers when they reprove them from his word. They often wish to be deemed the lambs of his fold, but their ungoverned tempers and rapacity show them to be more like furious lions devouring the prey: and instead of the purity and simplicity of the dove, they present to the view an heterogeneous mixture of religion and the world, with its vain fashions, maxims, pursuits, and pollutions. Thus many Churches become like speckled birds, mixing together religion and vain superstition; attempting to serve God and Mammon, and to form a coalition between light and darkness, Christ and Belial. But this the Lord abhors: and for such degeneracy he often leaves them to be punished by those whose vices and errors they have imitated. All the efforts of sinners to escape misery, without repentance and fruits meet for repentance, will surely terminate in confusion; "because of the fierce anger of the Lord." But if judgment begin at the house of God, let not the evil neighbours and persecutors of his Church expect impunity. Yet in wrath our God remembers mercy: he will assuredly return and compassionate his Church; and all who diligently learn his ways, and join themselves to his spiritual worshippers, shall be built up among them, even though they once were tempters of others to the vilest abominations: but inevitable destruction awaits all that persevere in disobedience. May we then employ ourselves diligently in learning the ways of the Lord, and be thankful that poor Gentiles may acceptably worship his name: let us endeavour, in our several places, to lead others also to the knowledge of "the truth as it is in Jesus:" and may he speedily unite Jews and Gentiles in one fold under one Shepherd, and destroy every enemy that does evil in his sanctuary.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIII. V. 1—7. It is probable that the girdle, worn by the prophet, was such as were used as ornaments by the priests at that time. He was directed to put it on without washing; 'to represent the Jews in their corrupt 'state of nature, when they had nothing to recommend 'them to grace and favour. (Compare Ez. xvi. 4.') (Lowth.) Perhaps the prophet was to wear the girdle for a considerable time without washing, when it would cease to be ornamental, and even become offensive; as an emblem of the corrupt state of Israel, the chosen people of God. (11.)—Many interpreters conclude that the subsequent transaction was only a vision: but it is related as a fact; and it is not adviseable, without evident necessity, to sanction such a mode of interpretation, in opposition to the obvious meaning of Scripture. Nay, the self-denying, laborious, implicit obedience of the prophet, in taking all these journeys of some hundreds of miles each, was aptly suited to render his sign impressive; to shame the disobedience of the people, and to show the excessive hardships to which they would be exposed by the approaching captivity. (Note, Hos. i. 2, 3.)

V. 8—11. It is probable that the people were acquainted with this sign, some time before it was expounded, and they were left to make their own observations on it: at length God instructed his servant to explain it to them. He had chosen Israel to be his covenanted people, and brought them near unto him by every external privilege, that they might be an honour and praise unto him: 'That 'they might have the honour of being called by my name; 'and that I might be glorified by their showing forth my 'truth and praises to the world.' (Lowth.) And this was the case whilst they adhered to his worship, and were obedient and prosperous. But they gloried in their peculiar distinctions, and were very proud of them, and at the same time turned aside to idolatry and iniquity. Thus 12 ¶ Therefore thou shalt speak unto them this word; Thus saith the LORD God of Israel, [p] Every bottle shall be filled with wine: and they shall say unto thee, Do we not certainly know that every bottle shall be filled with wine?

13 Then shalt thou say unto them, Thus saith the LORD, Behold, [q] I will fill all the inhabitants of this land, even the kings that sit upon David's throne, and the priests, and the prophets, and all the inhabitants of Jerusalem, with drunkenness.

14 And [r] I will dash them* one against another, [s] even the fathers and the sons together, saith the LORD: [t] I will not pity, nor spare, nor have mercy, † but destroy them.

15 ¶ Hear ye, [u] and give ear; [x] be not proud: [y] for the LORD hath spoken.

16 Give [z] glory to the LORD your God, [a] before he cause darkness, and before [b] your feet stumble upon the dark mountains, and, [c] while ye look for light, ye turn it into [d] the shadow of death, and make it gross darkness.

17 But [e] if ye will not hear it, [f] my soul shall weep in secret places for your pride; and mine eye shall weep sore, and run down with tears, [g] because the LORD's flock is carried away captive.

18 Say [h] unto the king and to the queen, [i] Humble yourselves, [k] sit down; for your ‡ principalities shall come down, even the crown of your glory.

19 The [l] cities of the south shall be [m] shut up, and none shall open them: [n] Judah shall be carried away captive all of it, it shall be wholly carried away captive.

they became a scandal instead of an honour to the Lord; losing their comeliness, and becoming polluted like the unwashen girdle. Therefore he purposed to punish them by the Chaldeans, and to carry the remnant of them captives to Babylon. Then their great pride would be marred, their temple would be destroyed, and its worship caused to cease; their city would be desolated, their prosperity ruined, their numbers reduced; and a poor despised enslaved company alone would be left to go captives to Babylon, and there to be worn out by oppressions, till they became like the decayed girdle. But though this would mar their great pride, it was not intended to ruin the nation, but to prepare them for future mercies. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12—14. The prophet was next ordered, in the name of the Lord, to assure the people that "every "bottle should be filled with wine." This seems to have been a proverbial expression, and applied in different ways; and the Lord forewarned him that they would reply, in a mixture of contempt and indignation, "Do we not cer- "tainly know that every bottle shall be filled with wine?" 'The hearers shall take this prophecy in great scorn, 'and say, What wonders are these that thou tellest us? 'As if we knew not that the use of bottles is, to be fill- 'ed with wine! Tell these things to children that under- 'stand nothing.' (Bp. Hall.) Upon this he was ordered to explain his meaning; and to show them, that as the bottle was fitted to hold the wine, so their sins had made them vessels of wrath fitted for the judgments of God: and that they should all be filled with them, till they were intoxicated and made furious to accomplish each other's destruction; like earthen bottles filled with wine and dashed against each other.

V. 15—17. These messages seem to have greatly exasperated the Jews: but the prophet endeavoured to enforce his warnings and soften their resentments by a most pathetic exhortation. He entreated their patient and attentive hearing; for these were indeed the words of God, and not his own devices. Instead of proudly rejecting his message, he exhorted them to give glory to God by confessing their sins, acknowledging his justice, humbling themselves in repentance, seeking forgiveness, and returning to his worship and service: and to do this without delay, that the threatened judgments might, if possible, be averted. Otherwise the Lord would speedily extinguish all their prosperity, and leave them in darkness and despondency; then they would be in distress, like that of men wandering in the dark upon the mountains, liable every moment to fall down precipices, or to be devoured by wild beasts. Or they would be carried from the "valley of vision," into countries destitute of the light of Revelation, and enveloped in all the darkness of idolatry and wickedness: there they would be left to stumble and fall without remedy; all their hopes would issue in disappointment and deeper distress, which would be introductory to the final misery and despair of those who persisted in impenitence. But if they would not hear his words, the prophet assures them, that, so far from rejoicing in the prospect of their miseries, he should weep secretly and bitterly, lamenting their pride and obstinacy, their presumption, and their contempt of the authority and defiance of the vengeance of God; which he knew would terminate in the captivity of the whole company of his professing people. The word rendered dark, seems to mean the break of day seen on the mountains. Various circumstances gave the Jews a sort of glimmering prospect of deliverance; appearing amid their dangers and calamities as the dawn of day. But when they expected that this would increase, and usher in clear light, God turned it into the very shadow of death: and the disappointment of these presumptuous hopes increased their misery.

21 What [q] wilt thou say when he shall * punish thee? [r] for thou hast taught them to be captains, and as chief over thee: [s] shall not sorrows take thee, as a woman in travail?

22 And [t] if thou say in thine heart, [u] Wherefore come these things upon me? [x] For the greatness of thine iniquity are [y] thy skirts discovered, and thy heels † made bare.

23 Can [z] the Ethiopian change his skin, or the leopard his spots? then may ye also do good, that are ‡ accustomed to do evil.

24 Therefore [a] will I scatter them [b] as the stubble that passeth away by the wind of the wilderness.

25 This is [c] thy lot, the portion of thy measures from me, saith the LORD; [d] because thou hast forgotten me, and [e] trusted in falsehood.

26 Therefore [f] will I discover thy skirts upon thy face, that thy shame may appear.

27 I have seen [g] thine adulteries, and thy neighings, the lewdness of thy whoredom, and [h] thine abominations on the hills in the fields. [i] Woe unto thee, O Jerusalem! [k] wilt thou not be made clean? § when shall it once be?

V. 18—21. Some think that Jeconiah and his mother are here meant: and others that Jehoiakim and his queen were addressed. (Marg. Ref.) The prophet seems to have charged the princes who heard him to repeat his words to the king and queen; requiring them in the name of God to sit down on the ground as penitents: for all the authority, splendour, and decorations, of which they were proud, would soon be brought to nothing: the cities of Judah would be besieged without being relieved, and the whole nation carried into captivity. Or those of Egypt, to which the Jews hoped to retreat if driven to extremities, would be shut against them, and none would be able to open them. The invaders would be seen coming from the north; and the prosperous nation, which had been committed to the care of the king soon after the death of Josiah, and which was also the flock of God, would be scattered, destroyed, or carried captive, through the wickedness of him and his princes. And what would he say, when the king of Babylon should come to punish him for his crimes? For the house of David and the people of Judah had brought themselves into dependence on that prince, by their sinful propensity to call in the help of heathen allies, instead of confiding in the Lord: and now their sorrows on that account would become extreme and unavailing.

V. 22. The Lord knew that the people would inquire, in their hearts at least, what they had done, that such punishments should be inflicted on them? To this thought he answered, that if their offences had not been very heinous, he would not have thus exposed them: but the greatness of their iniquity required that he should strip them of all their ornaments, and leave them exposed to the contempt and scorn of their enemies; that he might show his abhorrence of sin, especially in his professed worshippers.

V. 23. This proverbial expression is evidently adduced, to aggravate the incorrigible obstinacy of the Jews, and to show that no ordinary means would be effectual for their reformation: it might as reasonably be expected, that an Ethiopian could be brought by argument to change the colour of his skin, and the leopard to divest himself of his spots, as that exhortations would induce the Jews to renounce those idolatries and iniquities, to which they had been so long habituated. It also holds good of man's natural propensity to evil, and aversion to good, from which nothing can convert him, except the power that could change the colour of the negro's skin. But custom is second nature, which men voluntarily bring upon themselves, and which is doubly criminal and incorrigible. This was the general case of the Jews, and they were therefore to be cut off by desolating judgments; a remnant only being preserved, from whom a new race was to proceed, which had not contracted those habits of idolatry, that had so long been inveterate among their progenitors. —The word rendered accustomed, is, literally, instructed; not merely the effect of bad habits, but of false principles assiduously inculcated. 'Bochart maintains that the 'word Cush is never used for Ethiopia: but this text is a 'good proof of the contrary, and may most probably be 'understood of the Africans, or Blackmores, as they are 'commonly called.' 'A moral change in habitual sinners 'is almost as impossible as a natural one. Thus our Sa- 'viour compared the difficulty of a rich man's entering 'into the kingdom of God to a natural impossibility: 'viz. to "a camel's passing through the eye of a needle:" 'but yet qualifies the comparison by adding, "What is "impossible with man is possible with God." God's 'grace can surmount such difficulties as are impossible to 'nature to overcome: and thus we are to understand the 'text before us.' (Lowth.)

V. 27. The Jews not only were unable to cleanse themselves from their filthiness and idols; but they would not be made clean, being in love with their abominations. As the Lord used all proper means for their being cleansed, and was ready to afford effectual assistance to those who sought it, their unwillingness to be made clean was their only inability: for by his help the Ethiopian might change his skin, and they might learn to do good. The Lord therefore here demands of Jerusalem, Whether she was determined not to be made clean? And how long this was to be delayed, if she ever intended it? For all her miseries arose from this not having been at any time the case with her.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—14.

They who are employed in the more important parts of the Lord's service, will often be called to peculiar self-denial and hardship: it behooves us to render implicit obedience to all his commands, however laborious they may be, and though they should seem unreasonable to the carnal eye: and if we obey the will of God as far as we know it at present, he will give us further instructions, as they become needful. Every means should be used, by which the minds of men may be made sensible of their ingratitude and rebellion against God, and awakened to a conviction of their guilt and danger; yet nothing will be effectual without the concurrent influences of the Holy Spirit. The peculiar advantages which the Lord confers on nations favoured with his word and ordinances, are intended to render them his people; and that they may be to him for a name, a praise, and a glory: but no external relation will profit those who refuse to hear his words, and persist in walking after the imaginations of their evil hearts; and degenerate professors of religion are the most worthless, and shall be rendered the most contemptible, of all men. When the gifts of God render men proud and presumptuous, they will either be torn from them, or increase their disgrace and misery: but whatever the Lord takes from us or lays upon us, if he "mar the great pride of our hearts," and bring us to self-abasement and true repentance, we shall have cause to be very thankful. Every kind of sin renders men vessels of wrath fitted for destruction: but pride and impenitence continue them in that state, and make way for their being filled with the wrath of Almighty God. When nations are thus ripened for destruction; all ranks of men may expect to be filled with his indignation: and then they are often so given up to ambition, envy, suspicion, and revenge, as to destroy one another by civil wars and intestine discord; in which even parents and children engage in opposite parties and destroy one another. And when God is provoked to say, "I will not "pity, nor spare, nor have mercy, but destroy them;" rage, misery, and desperation must be the effect.

V. 15—27.

The proud are not disposed to hear the warnings of God by his ministers; they do not believe that he hath spoken by them, but ascribe their alarming words to melancholy or malevolence: and thus they disregard the friendly admonition, until it be too late. Yet whether men will hear, or whether they will forbear, we must call upon them to give glory to God by repentance, faith, and conversion to him, whilst the day of his patience endures. And though the humiliation of individuals may not prevent national judgments, it will preserve them from darkness and despair. It is very dreadful when kingdoms are wasted, the inhabitants massacred or enslaved, and Churches bereaved of the light of divine truth: but when God leaves men to be blinded, and to fall into error and delusion here, and into the blackness of darkness hereafter, the judgment is most tremendous: and who can tell how soon the Lord may leave the obstinate unbeliever thus to stumble and fall; and while he looks for light, to find it turned into the shadow of death, and made gross darkness? The true minister will be deeply affected at the pride of those who regard not the word of God; he often laments in his closet over such as he has offended by his awful warnings: and if sinners could witness the prayers offered for them, and the tears shed on their account, by some who declare the counsel of God unto them, they could not but ascribe their plain-dealing to other causes than they now do. All misery witnessed, or foreseen, will affect a feeling mind; but the pious heart mourns most over the afflictions of the Lord's flock. As none are too great to be sinners, and to be accountable to God; and as nations and Churches suffer through the folly and wickedness of princes; it should be said to them especially, 'Humble yourselves before God, 'and penitently sue for his mercy, submit to his will and 'seek his glory, and the honour that cometh from him.'— All other distinctions are a vain pageantry, which will soon be terminated by death, and are often taken away in this life: and as ministers must give an account of the people committed to their charge, so must kings and rulers of the nations which they were intrusted to govern, and of the good or mischief which they did with their authority. But what will sinners say, when they shall be delivered up to be punished by that enemy, whom they have long allowed to rule over them? Will not sorrows then seize on them, as on a woman in travail? It is natural for pride to object, Wherefore are we to be thus punished? But all such objections will be answered, when the Lord shall expose to the whole world the greatness of their iniquities. It is a dreadful case when sinners become habituated to evil, even under the means of grace: their inability to do good becomes the great aggravation of their guilt, and renders them obstinate and incorrigible in rebellion, and perfectly like Satan, the arch-apostate and rebel; and thus they are given over to final obduracy. Men should therefore be very careful not to contract habits of sin, and not to stifle the convictions of their consciences. Yet, though we cannot change the Ethiopian's skin, or the leopard's spots, our God can; and neither natural depravity, nor the strongest habits of iniquity, form any obstacle to the operations of his new-creating Spirit. We should therefore hope and pray for, and endeavour to do good to, those who are the most enslaved to inveterate habits of vice. And if any poor slave of sin feels that he could as soon change the course of nature, as master his headstrong lusts, or learn to delight in doing good: let him not despair; for "the "things that are impossible to man, are possible to God;" and he even now asketh him, Whether he will or will not be made clean? Let him then without delay call for help to him who is almighty to save, and who waiteth to be gracious, and he will say to him, "I will, be thou clean," and so his leprosy shall be cleansed. But if men hesitate, and procrastinate, and will not use the appointed means of cleansing, misery and wo will be measured out to them as their portion, for having forgotten God, trusted in falsehood, and multiplied their crimes against him.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIV. V. 1. 'The Hebrew word, (rendered 'dearth,) signifies restraint; that is, "when the heaven is "shut up there is no rain." (Lowth.) Some think that the events referred to in this chapter occurred about the end of Josiah's reign: but it is more likely that all these prophecies were delivered at a later period, and nearer to the final desolations of the land; at least after the open prevalence of idolatry which followed the death of Josiah.

V. 2—6. Some render this passage in the future, as a prediction: but the prophet seems to speak of scenes which he himself witnessed. He has here given us a melancholy description of this calamity and its effects. Through the want of rain, and the consequent failure of the crops, the whole land of Judah mourned in deep distress: they who went in and out through the gates of the cities, languished for want of food; or the gates were unfrequented by those who had been used to bring in provisions. The people neglected their persons, and lay on the ground, squalid, meagre, and dejected, through want and misery: and the cry of Jerusalem went up; either their cries of distress, or their supplications for deliverance; for it is probable that a day of fasting and humiliation was observed on this occasion. (12.) The very nobles were distressed for want of water, and sent either their own children, (as not caring to trust any others in this emergency,) or their own servants, to fetch it from the wells or cisterns, but none could be had: and they returned with empty vessels, ashamed, and covering their heads as mourners or penitents. The husbandman either could not plow the parched ground, or he cultivated it in vain; so that they were ashamed of their confidence in their industry and knowledge of agriculture, and found themselves unable to support their families, or sustain their own lives. The very beasts shared the distress: the hinds forsook their young, (as is usual with some animals in such circumstances,) not having any milk for them, through want of food for themselves: and the wild asses gasped for breath, and looked like dragons or large serpents, which in hot and dry seasons greedily inhale the cooling air on the tops of mountains: and their eyes grew dim through heat, hunger, and thirst.

V. 7—9. In this extreme distress the prophet ventured to intercede for his people, notwithstanding the interdiction that had been laid upon him, (vii. 16. xi. 14.) and he seems still to have indulged a hope, that by repentance the threatened judgments might be averted; or at least that it would be a lengthening of their tranquillity. He acknowledged that their multiplied apostacies, idolatries, and iniquities, were so many witnesses against them, that they had deserved these miseries: but he entreated the Lord, for the honour of his own name, to interpose in their behalf. He had always been the only hope of Israel; and their Deliverer even from those troubles which had come upon them for their sins: and would he now finally forsake them? He had dwelt among them, and taken care of them as of his own habitation; and if he left them for a time, to chastise them for their sins, he had soon returned to them in mercy: and would he now be a stranger? or as a traveller, who, having tarried for a night in any place, departs next morning and takes no more thought about it? he had showed himself ready and able to save: and would he now appear like a man who is surprised by some unexpected accident, which renders him unable to save 10 Thus saith the LORD unto this people, Thus [z] have they loved to wander, they have not [a] refrained their feet, therefore [b] the LORD doth not accept them; [c] he will now remember their iniquity, and visit their sins.

11 Then said the LORD unto me, [d] Pray not for this people for their good.

12 When [e] they fast, I will not hear their cry; [f] and when they offer burnt-offerings and an oblation, I will not accept them: [g] but I will consume them by the sword, and by the famine, and by the pestilence.

13 ¶ Then said I, Ah, Lord GOD! [h] behold the prophets say unto them, Ye shall not see the sword, neither shall ye have famine; but I will give you * assured peace in this place.

14 Then the LORD said unto me, [i] The prophets prophesy lies in my name: [k] I sent them not, neither have I commanded them, neither spake unto them; they prophesy unto you a false vision and [l] divination, and a thing of nought, and the deceit of their heart.

15 Therefore thus saith the LORD concerning the prophets that prophesy in my name, and I sent them not, yet they say, [m] Sword and famine shall not be in this land: By sword and famine shall those prophets be consumed.

16 And [n] the people to whom they prophesy shall [o] be cast out in the streets of Jerusalem, because of the famine and the sword; and they shall have none to bury them, their wives, nor their sons, nor their daughters: [p] for I will pour their wickedness upon them.

17 Therefore thou shalt say this word unto them; [q] Let mine eyes run down with tears night and day, and let them not cease: for [r] the virgin daughter of my people is broken with a great breach, [s] with a very grievous blow.

18 If I [t] go forth into the field, then behold the slain with the sword! and if I enter into the city, then behold them that are sick with famine! [u] yea, both the prophet and the priest † go about into a land that they know not.

19 Hast thou [x] utterly rejected Judah? [y] hath thy soul loathed Zion? why hast thou smitten us, and there is [z] no healing those that expect help from his power and valour? The Gentiles would be ready to draw such conclusions from the calamities of that people, by whom JEHOVAH had so long been worshipped, among whom he had his only temple, and who were called by his name: and therefore the prophet pleaded, that the honour of his power, wisdom, truth, and goodness, engaged him not to leave them to sink under their afflictions.

V. 10—12. The Lord condescended to show the prophet, that his zeal in this case was not according to knowledge. He calls the Jews "this people," not "my "people:" they had delighted to wander into idolatry and iniquity; and they did not refrain their feet from walking in those evil ways, either from fear or love of him. He therefore declared, that he no longer accepted them, but was determined to punish them according to their sins, for the honour of his justice and holiness. And he would not have Jeremiah pray any more for good to them: nor would their fastings, prayers, and sacrifices, in which it is probable they were then engaged, prevent still heavier vengeance from falling on them; for "these were but the beginning "of sorrows." (Note, vii. 16.)

V. 13—16. The prophet could not but allow the justice of the Lord's controversy with the people: yet he was desirous of finding something to plead in their behalf. He thought that the false prophets were the most criminal; for they flattered the people with assurances of peace and prosperity, and set them against the faithful warnings of the true prophets. This the Lord allowed to be the case; and with great severity gave sentence against them: but as "the people loved to have it so," they were not to be excused or to escape: for judgments corresponding to their enormous wickedness were about to be poured out on them. —The many energetic words which are used in describing the conduct of the false prophets, and the Lord's indignation both at them and the people, are peculiarly suitable to the occasion, and calculated to lay hold on the reader's attention.

V. 17, 18. The Lord next ordered his servant to declare before the people his determination to give a loose to incessant and excessive grief, in the prospect of those miseries which he could not prevent, either by his warnings or prayers. They then endured great distress from famine; but far greater calamities were approaching: and Jerusalem would be broken in a more grievous manner than she had ever before been. Then in the field would be seen those that had been slain by the Chaldean besiegers; and in the city such as were dying of famine: even the priests and prophets would attempt to flee into foreign lands for safety; and such as remained would be carried away captive. The last clause may be rendered, "because "both the prophet and the priest carry on a trade against "the land, and they acknowledge it not." "For filthy "lucre's sake," they deceived the people with lying divinations, and promised them peace: yet, when charged with it, they would not own their guilt and seek forgiveness. The verb here translated know, is rendered acknowledge in the twentieth verse. (Marg.)

V. 19—22. The prophet still pleaded for a mitigation of the sentence. Had the Lord utterly cast off Judah, his visible Church, in which the promised Messiah was to be raised up? Did he abhor Zion, the place of his temple and worship, and the type of good things to come? And would he no longer have a Church on earth? If this were not his purpose, wherefore did he so smite them, that there was no healing? None else could, and he would not, heal them: and all their expectations of deliverance and peace were frustrated. He then acknowledged his own sins and those of his people: but he still prayed that the Lord would not abhor them, for the honour of his great name. The temple, in which he manifested his special presence above the mercy seat, was "the throne of his glory" on earth; which would be disgraced, if profaned by the heathen: and he pleaded with the LORD, that he would remember his covenant and not break it; either his covenant with Abraham and his seed, or that with David and his seed; for the national covenant had been utterly violated and forfeited on the part of the people. Even in their present distress, none of the idols of the Gentiles could help them, nor could the heavens give rain of themselves: they had none to apply to but the LORD; and on him they waited for relief, as the omnipotent Creator and Governor of all things. 'He teacheth the Church a form of prayer, to 'humble themselves to God by true repentance, which is 'the only mean to avoid this famine.' Though most of the people were either hypocrites or idolaters; yet a small remnant of believers may be supposed to have joined the prophet in these prayers: and probably they prevailed for the removal of the famine, though not for the prevention of the captivity. (xv. 1.) 'The Hebrew word Hu, (He,) 'is often equivalent to the true or eternal God: See espe- 'cially Ps. cii. 27, where the expression is the same as 'that of the text, "Thou art He," our English reads, "Thou art the same." (Lowth.) The apostle applies this to our Saviour. (Heb. i. 10—12. xiii. 8.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—12.

Our entire dependence on God is manifest in every thing: if he withholds the showers of rain, the fields no longer yield their increase, the springs of water fail, tillage ceases, flourishing cities languish, and the inhabitants wax pale, faint, and die: and should he continue this sore judgment, the earth with all its proudest and wealthiest possessions must perish. When man's iniquity hath provoked the Lord thus to visit any land, the inhabitants often lament their miseries, without any due regard to him, or humiliation for their sins; and they express their anguish in much the same way as the innocent animals do, which are involved in their punishment; except that their complaints are rebellious as well as bitter. And often, when fasts are proclaimed, and formal confessions and supplications made before God, the insincerity of those concerned is demonstrated by the want of fruits meet for repentance: and then such hypocritical cries are disregarded and rejected. Whatever men trust to, whilst they neglect God and his service and salvation, it will finally disappoint them: they will return from their broken cisterns with their vessels empty, and ashamed of their confidence: nor will industry and ingenuity stand them in any more stead than nobility and affluence, when God ariseth to execute vengeance. But they who make the Hope of Israel their confidence, will find him a present Saviour in every time of trouble, in the hour of death, and in the day of judgment. And though our manifold iniquities testify against us, and our backslidings have been many: yet, if we now return to the Lord, by sincere repentance, faith, and prayer, he will save us, to the glory of his grace. Such genuine converts will long for the salvation of their neighbours and relatives, and will interest themselves in the concerns of the Church: and they are sometimes more troubled for the miseries which oppress or await others, than for their own share in temporal calamities. They will therefore supplicate their reconciled God in behalf of all connected with them, for their native country, and that part of the Church especially to which they belong. Here also the mercy of God, and the honour of his name, supply many a plea to urge before him, in behalf of those whose iniquities testify against them: for the Hope and Saviour of Israel will return to deliver those communities in which a considerable remnant of true believers are found; though otherwise they are justly deserving of his severest vengeance. But when the faithful fail, and the measure of iniquity is filled up, the Lord will certainly estrange himself from those that have been most favoured with the means of grace; and his glory will require that they be more severely punished, than less enlightened communities. He can silence the blasphemies of his enemies, when he sees good thus to punish those who are called by his name; and show that he knows how, and is able, to deliver them when he pleases, though for a time he leave them to smart for their iniquities. And when he showeth his servants how they, for whom they plead, love to wander, and do not refrain their feet from any evil way, they will be constrained to allow the justice of his most awful dispensations.

CHAP. XV.

God determines, let who will intercede, to pour out many heavy judgments on the Jews, 1—9. Jeremiah complains that he is generally hated; and God promises good to him amidst the calamities of the nation, 10—14. He professes his integrity, and renews his complaints, 15—18. God recalls him to his work, and promises to support and deliver him in the due discharge of it, 19—21.

V. 13—22.

The false teachers, which have always abounded in the visible Church, are of all others the most criminal; whilst they speak lies in the name of God, and by teaching the people false doctrine and the deceit of their hearts, they encourage men to expect peace and salvation without repentance, faith, conversion, and holiness of life: thus much of the guilt and misery of mankind will be charged to their account: and inevitable and tremendous destruction will overwhelm them. But as the hatred of truth and holiness, and the love of sin, dispose men to prefer such ministers of Satan to the faithful servants of God; they who are thus given up to a strong delusion to believe a lie, will not be allowed to plead this for an excuse, when the Lord shall pour their wickedness upon them. He is righteous in these judgments: yet it behooves us to mourn over the miseries of the human race; for the law that commands us to love our neighbour as ourselves, and not the purpose of God, is our rule of conduct. And when we consider, how "evil men and seducers wax worse and "worse, deceiving and being deceived," to the temporal ruin of nations and churches, and the destruction of innumerable immortal souls; our eyes might well run down with tears night and day, and not cease: and we should more frequently be thus affected, if we were more of his mind, who wept over Jerusalem, and prayed on the cross for his persecutors. Yet we need not fear lest the Lord should utterly reject his Church, or abhor his ordinances: he will always have a people to commune with him at his mercy-seat, and never suffer that throne of his glory to be disgraced, or break his covenant with the great Redeemer. Though he may smite, and not heal, professing nations and hypocrites; yet he will bind up the wounded conscience of every true penitent, and heal the stripes that he inflicts on his believing people: and if he should not see good to hear our prayers in behalf of our guilty land; yet he will certainly bless with temporal and eternal salvation all who confess their sins before him, and wait on him for his promised mercy. But this implies an express and unreserved renouncing of every other dependence; for even in the case of drought, what unbelievers call nature can no more give showers, than the idols of the heathen could. 'On the contrary, God directs them when and where they 'shall fall.' (Lowth.) Thus "every good and perfect "gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of "lights, with whom is no variableness or shadow of "turning:" and in him alone must we trust, on him alone must we wait, for all things pertaining to this life and to that which is to come.

NOTES.

CHAP. XV. - V. 1. The prophet still continued importunately to pray for his people; but the Lord had determined not to grant his requests in this particular: yet, in order to reconcile his mind to this refusal, he declared that even Moses and Samuel must plead in vain in the present case. They had separately and repeatedly prevailed with him to pardon his offending people, when they lived on earth, and were most eminent among his servants: but if both of them should unite to intercede for Israel now, the mind or favourable regard of God could not be towards them; their crimes were so enormous, and their habits of rebellion so inveterate. He had therefore given orders for them to be cast out of the land; for he could no longer endure them in his sight. This passage fully proves that departed saints do not intercede for us: for it is implied that Moses and Samuel did not then stand before the Lord in behalf of Israel.

V. 2—4. The same law that condemns the malefactor determines his punishment. So the condemned Jews were appointed to different kinds of misery by the righteous judgment of God: and this decision was notified to them, that they might see to what straits their sins had reduced them. Pestilence, (called here death, as it kills without any visible cause,) and the sword and famine, would destroy the most of them, and a few would be reserved for captivity. Whilst the sword of the enemy would cut off vast numbers, their dead bodies would be left unburied, to be devoured by dogs, and by birds and beasts of prey; and the survivors would be subjected to fierce and cruel oppressors. Their remnant would be removed into the most distant regions; because of their willing concurrence and impenitent continuance in the idolatries and iniquities of Manasseh, notwithstanding all the methods afterwards used to reclaim them. (Note, 2 Kings, xxiii. 26, 27.) 'The 'word rendered remove, signifies to run to and fro for 'fear and unquietness of consience, as did Cain.'

V. 5. 'Every body, that sees the calamities brought 'upon thee, will own them to be just. Who will be so 'much concerned for thee, as to step a little out of his 'way to inquire after thee? Rather they that pass by 'will insult over thy calamities.' (Lowth.)

V. 6. I am, &c. The Lord had often threatened to execute judgment on the people; but he had spared them on their repentance, and in answer to the prayers of his servants: thus he seemed to repent of the evil that he said he would do unto them. But as they continually relapsed into idolatry, his patience was, as it were, worn out, and he was weary of repenting: that is, it was proper for him to take vengeance on them.

V. 7. The nation in general was become as chaff: and therefore the Lord would drive them by his judgments from the gates of their cities all over the land; as the fan drives away the chaff. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 8, 9. The vast slaughter made by the victorious enemy, and by other judgments, would leave great numbers of widows, who would have none but God to take care of them; thus they would be increased "to Him;" (for the future is spoken of, as if it were already arrived.) The Lord was about to bring upon Jerusalem, (the mother-city, or metropolis of Judah,) a young man, a spoiler at noon-day, who would plunder openly by force, and not secretly by fraud; or against the mother and the young men her children. Nebuchadnezzar was the spoiler intended: he was a young man when he took Jerusalem; and he suddenly fell on the city, and filled it with terrors and miseries. Then the populous city was made desolate: the mothers who had brought up many children were broken hearted with grief, at hearing that they were all slain: Jerusalem's honour and prosperity terminated unexpectedly, as if the sun should set before the time; and the remnant of her inhabitants were given up to be slain or enslaved by the conqueror, at his pleasure.

V. 10. The prophet had rendered himself very obnoxious by his awful predictions; and he could not prevail for a mitigation of the sentence denounced against his people: nay, he was sent with still severer messages of vengeance. This he knew would expose him to their more violent resentment; and therefore he lamented that his mother ever bare him, to be a man of strife and contention to the whole land. For he was doomed to spend his life in contending against the sins of the people, and the delusions of the false prophets; and to be treated as a troublesome quarrelsome person for so doing. He had neither borrowed nor lent money in an usurious manner; he meddled not with secular concerns; he gave no umbrage and did no injury in those matters, which are the common grounds of contention: and yet he was more generally hated and cursed, than any fraudulent debtor or oppressing creditor.

His trials were doubtless great: yet there was much infirmity in these passionate wishes and complaints. 'I 'am an object of the common hatred: every body takes 'occasion to quarrel with me; because I speak such 'truths as they do not care to hear.' (Lowth.) 'He 'showeth what is the condition of God's ministers; name-'ly, to have all the world against them, though they give 'none occasion.'

V. 11. In order to calm the ruffled spirit of his servant, the Lord graciously engaged that it should be "well "with his remnant:" either with him for the remnant of his days; or with the remnant of the people who attended to his word and joined in his prayers. They should be supported and comforted under all their troubles, and all should end well: and the enemy would treat the prophet with kindness, whilst his opposers were overwhelmed with calamities. (Notes, xl. 2—6.)

12 Shall [f] iron break the northern iron and the steel?

13 Thy substance and [g] thy treasures will I give to the spoil without price, and that for all thy sins, even in all thy borders.

14 And I will make thee to [h] pass with thine enemies into a land which thou knowest not: for [i] a fire is kindled in mine anger, which shall burn upon you.

15 ¶ O LORD, [k] thou knowest: [l] remember me, and visit me, and revenge me of my persecutors; [m] take me not away in thy long-suffering: [n] know that for thy sake I have suffered rebuke.

16 Thy words were found, and [o] I did eat them; and thy word was unto me [p] the joy and rejoicing of mine heart: for * I am called by thy name, O LORD God of hosts.

17 I [q] sat not in the assembly of the mockers, nor rejoiced; [r] I sat alone, because of thy hand: [s] for thou hast filled me with indignation.

18 Why is [t] my pain perpetual, and my wound incurable, which refuseth to be healed? wilt thou be altogether unto me [u] as a liar, [x] and as waters that † fail?

19 Therefore thus saith the LORD, [y] If thou return, then will I bring thee again, and [z] thou shalt stand before me: and [a] if thou take forth the precious from the vile, thou shalt be [b] as my mouth: [c] let them return unto thee; but return not thou unto them.

20 And [d] I will make thee unto this people a fenced brazen wall: and they shall fight against thee; [e] but they shall not prevail against thee: [f] for I am with thee to save thee, and to deliver thee, saith the LORD.

21 And [g] I will deliver thee out of the hand of the wicked, and I will redeem thee out of the hand of [h] the terrible.

V. 12—14. The Jews endeavoured to fortify the city, and to form alliances against the Chaldeans; and they hardened their hearts, as if they could out-brave or withstand the indignation of the LORD. But could ordinary iron, though hard and strong in itself, break that which was of a much stronger kind and well tempered? No more could they prevail against their northern invaders, or those divine judgments which they were sent to inflict. All their treasures would certainly be given to these spoilers, without any possibility of buying them off; and they would be carried away into the land of their enemies, for the sins committed in every part of the country.—'God 'would deal with them as men do with the refuse of their 'stock or goods, which they are glad to be rid of on any 'terms.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 15—18. The prophet still found his mind greatly discomposed, so that he opened his case before God, with some impatience and peevish expressions; and the whole was recorded for the instruction of the Church in other ages. He was sensible that the Lord knew his integrity, his circumstances, and his enemies: he entreated him to remember and visit him with mercy, and to revenge his cause; and not to take him away whilst he exercised his long-suffering towards his persecutors, seeing that he was hated and reproached for his sake. 'Suffer not mine 'enemies to take away my life. Verbs active, in the 'Hebrew language, do often signify only permission.'—The prophet had found the words of God as a valued treasure; he had meditated on them, and well digested both the ancient books of the Scripture and the revelations immediately made to him; and he had found much comfort and joy in them. He had been known as his prophet, and had cheerfully received and delivered his messages; in hopes that the people would have been brought to repentance: he had withdrawn himself from all intercourse with the profane and scornful, and had not frequented their revels nor shared in their carnal mirth; but had lived in retirement: and the awful predictions with which he had been charged, the impenitence and opposition of the people, and the trials allotted him, had marred all his joy, and filled him with terror, sorrow, and melancholy; because of the Lord's indignation with his people, or their indignation at him. But wherefore was his pain thus made perpetual? Why was he oppressed with grief which would admit of no remedy? The Lord had promised to deliver him; and would he break his promise and act after the manner of deceitful men? or as waters which fail in drought when they are most wanted?

V. 19—21. The prophet was out of temper, and heartless about his work; and in a frame of mind which may be best understood by those who have been tried a little in the same way. But the Lord called him to repent of his impatience and to return to his work. In this case he would again employ and honour him; he would bring him out of his difficulties, and cause him to stand with acceptance before him. And if he learned to distinguish betwixt the precious and the vile, especially in respect of the characters of the people; that he might address them severally for reproof, conviction, instruction, or consolation; then the Lord would employ him as his mouth, to declare his will, and certainly would take care of him.—But he must go on steadily with his work, using every means to bring the people to return to him, as their prophet, and to obey the Lord's word by him; and in case they would not, to leave the matter with him; but not to go down at all upon their ground, not to vary from his instructions, not to accommodate in the least to their wishes, nor to give the least countenance, or encouragement to them in their sins, either by his doctrine or example. If he attended to these things, he might be assured that the Lord would perform his promises before made to him, and deliver him from the most powerful and malicious of his enemies. (Note, i. 18, 19.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

The holy God so abhors evil, and his honour is so engaged to punish it; that it is absolutely impossible his heart can be towards obstinate and impenitent sinners: and if the prayers even of his most eminent servants for the wicked are not answered by their conversion, they cannot avail for their deliverance from deserved misery: nor can any thing rescue guilty nations from divine judgments, without it tends in some measure to their reformation.—Whilst we remain on earth, we ought to persevere in prayer for our unconverted relations and connexions: but "the spirits of just men made perfect" would not, if they might, say a word in behalf of any for whom the heavenly advocate does not intercede; and his intercession suffices for all that come to God through him. Dreadful will be the case of all those whom the Lord finally rejects and abhors. The variety of temporal calamities which he inflicts on guilty nations; the wars, famines, and pestilences, that waste them; the imprisonment and slavery, loss of children and other near relatives; the terror, anguish, and pain, to which numbers are exposed, are no more than an earnest of the wrath to come, which awaits all impenitent workers of iniquity.—Bad examples and abused influence, authority and talents, often produce fatal effects after men are dead: this may be the case even with those who live to repent, and so escape the worst personal consequences of their crimes; and this shows us how important it is to begin early to serve the Lord. These things, however, are no more than occasions to men's sins, which originate from the evil of their own hearts; and therefore they justly deserve punishment: yet we should greatly dread being the guilty, or even the innocent, occasions of it. We ought while here to compassionate and bemoan those who suffer for their sins, and interest ourselves in their concerns: but the wicked will perish unpitied and unlamented, when God shall stretch forth his hand against them to destroy them; because their obstinate impenitence has wearied out his patience.

V. 10—21.

The ministers of God are constrained to declare his whole counsel, though the proud be exasperated. And however upright, prudent, harmless, blameless, benevolent, and peaceable, their conduct may be; however they avoid being entangled with the affairs of this life, and shun every appearance of evil; so long as they contend against sin and error, and those who commit or favour them, they will be deemed pestilent fellows, troublers of the city, and men of strife and contention. But as prophets and apostles, (and even Christ himself,) were thus hated, reviled, and execrated, by the ungodly, instead of complaining that we are exposed to such treatment, we should rejoice and be exceedingly glad, that we are conformed to such honourable patterns, and because "our reward is great in heaven." Yet in such circumstances unbelief and impatience are apt to stir and to sour our tempers, cloud our judgments, and suggest improper thoughts and words. But our gracious Lord will tenderly bear with the infirmities of his upright servants, and give them proper encouragement: and assuredly it will be well in life and death with all the remnant of true believers; whilst all their enemies will be consumed by the fire that the Lord hath kindled in his anger; and the stoutest and proudest of them will be utterly unable to withstand him, or the weapons of his indignation. We should acquiesce in the judgments of God upon his enemies, and rejoice in his knowledge of us, and of all our trials; we should beseech him to remember and visit us in our trials with his salvation, and to preserve us from our persecutors. When we are conscious that we are rebuked for his sake, we may plead it as a reason why he should interpose in our behalf; but we should rather pray for the conversion of our persecutors, than to be avenged of them. Happy are they who seek and find the words of the Lord; who can relish and feed on them in their hearts, by faith, prayer, and meditation; and who can truly say, that they are the joy and rejoicing of their souls: such are justly called by the name of the Lord, and they will have pleasant employment for their retired hours. Indeed, we all ought to avoid the assembly of the mockers; and the sensual and dissipated pleasures of the ungodly; and court retirement, for searching the Scriptures, for meditation and prayer; (Ps. i. 1, 2:) yet whilst we are suitably affected with the calamities of the Church and the world, and mourn for our own sins and sorrows, we should not indulge melancholy or moroseness, nor exclude ourselves wholly from society; lest we grow fretful, impatient, and unfit for our duty. Even in complaining to God, we are prone to give place to unholy tempers, and to use distrustful and irreverent expressions: as if our griefs were unnecessary, intolerable, or incurable; or as if he disappointed our expectations grounded on his faithful word. Thus we often dishonour him and disquiet ourselves; and he might justly leave us to the effects of our sin and folly; but he bears with us, and checks the progress of our evil tempers. Yet we cannot expect the comfort or credit of his favour and service, except in the exercise of faith, submission, and diligence in our work: and to stand accepted with him is an abundant recompense for all that we can do or suffer for his sake. They who are employed as his mouth must learn to distinguish the precious from the vile, in doctrines, practices, experiences, and characters; that they may be "workmen, who need not be ashamed, rightly dividing

THE [a] word of the LORD came also unto me, saying,

2 Thou shalt [b] not take thee a wife, neither shalt thou have sons or daughters in this place.

3 For thus saith the LORD concerning the sons and concerning the daughters that are born in this place, and concerning their mothers that bare them, and concerning their fathers that begat them in this land.

4 They shall [c] die of grievous deaths; [d] they shall not be lamented; [e] neither shall they be buried; but they shall be [f] as dung upon the face of the earth: and they shall be [g] consumed by the sword, and by famine; and their carcases shall be [h] meat for the fowls of heaven, and for the beasts of the earth.

5 For thus saith the LORD; [i] Enter not into the house of * mourning, neither go to lament nor bemoan them: for [k] I have taken away my peace from this people, saith the LORD, even loving-kindness and mercies.

6 Both [l] the great and the small shall die in this land: [m] they shall not be buried, neither shall men lament for them, [n] nor cut themselves, nor make themselves bald for them:

7 Neither shall men † tear themselves for them in mourning, to comfort them for the dead; neither shall men give them the [o] cup of consolation to drink for their father, or for their mother.

8 Thou shalt not also go into [p] the house of feasting, to sit with them to eat and to drink.

9 For thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel, Behold, [q] I will cause to cease out of this place in your eyes, and in your days, the voice of mirth, and the voice of gladness, the voice of the bridegroom, and the voice of the bride.

10 ¶ And it shall come to pass, when thou shalt shew this people all these words, and they shall say unto thee, [r] Wherefore hath the LORD pronounced all this great evil against us? or what is our iniquity? or what is our sin that we have committed against the LORD our God?

11 Then shalt thou say unto them, [s] Because your fathers have forsaken me, saith the LORD, and have [t] walked after other gods, and have served them, and have worshipped them, and have forsaken me, and have not kept my law;

12 And ye have done [u] worse than your fathers; for, behold, ye walk every one after the ‡ imagination of his [x] evil heart, that they may not hearken unto me:

"the word of truth." They must endeavour to reduce their hearers to the scriptural standard of faith and holiness: but by no means must they lower the requirements of God's word, or accommodate their message to the humours, sentiments, fashions, or characters of men; or teach them to seek safety and happiness in any other way than that laid down in the gospel. When they strictly adhere to this plan, they may be sure that the Lord will protect, uphold, comfort, and prosper them; and they need not fear prevailing against every terrible and wicked opposer: but they who are men-pleasers cannot be the servants of Jesus Christ, but will at length be put to shame, and perish.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVI. V. 2—4. 'Fruitfulness was promised as a blessing under the law, (Deut. xxviii. 4:) 'but it ceased to be so, in such difficult times as were 'coming on the Jewish nation.' (Lowth.) The prophet was therefore forbidden to marry, and required to make the prohibition known, in order the more forcibly to impress the minds of the people with the apprehension of the reality and near approach of the tremendous judgments which he had predicted. The time was at hand, when the most endeared relations would be an additional cause of anguish and misery: and to manifest his assured belief of this, the prophet was to remain unmarried, that he might be less encumbered and more prepared for days of distress. (Marg. Ref.) (Notes, 1 Cor. vii. 6—9. 25—28.)

V. 5—7. The best comment on these verses may be found in any authentic narrative of what takes place, when dire pestilence baffles all efforts to restrain it, in a city or district. So far from the customary funeral-rites being attended to, it often happens, that houses are deserted, where the dead, nay dying, remain; who are not found for some time, and then in circumstances too horrid to be described. Several of these customary tokens of mourning were prohibited by the law.

V. 8, 9. Fasting and mourning for sin were more seasonable in these circumstances, than any kind of mirth or pleasure. "In your eyes, and in your days:" this clearly showed, that the predicted miseries would no longer be delayed.

V. 10—12. 'Because the wicked dissemble their own 'sins, and murmur against God's judgments, as though 'he had no just cause to punish them; he showeth the pro-'phet what to answer.' It is worthy of remark, how much the spirit of self vindication appeared in the Jews, even in the grossly wicked state of the nation at this time. Several times already we have seen the traces of it in this prophecy. It is inherent in human nature, and no enor-

15 But, The LORD liveth, [c] that brought up the children of Israel from the land of the north, and from all the lands whither he had driven them: and I will bring them again into the land that I gave unto their fathers.

mity or actual guilt will subdue or silence it. The iniquities of the fathers are punished in the children, because, in general, bad education, bad examples, and false principles, lead children to imitate and even to exceed the wickedness of their fathers: but it is here intimated, that had not this generation of Israel copied the crimes of their ancestors, and grown worse than they, the threatened judgments would not have been poured out upon them.

V. 13. Serve other gods, &c. 'Mr. Mede expounds 'this of their serving those nations who worshipped 'other gods. The Chaldee paraphrase explains the phrase 'to the same purpose, Ye shall serve those people that 'worship idols night and day.' (Lowth.) It is, however, probable, that most of the Jews were on some occasions seduced or terrified into conformity to the idolatry of the victors, (Notes, Dan. iii:) and many of them might be incorporated among the idolaters; though the nation in general was by the captivity cured of that sin. (Notes, Deut. xxviii. 36. 64.) The last clause is by some rendered, "So long as I shall not have given them grace." (xxxii. 37—41.)

V. 14, 15. "Surely the days come," &c.—The same particle is rendered surely, v. 2: and that construction best suits this place. Intimations of mercy in reserve for the Jews were given in the midst of the denunciations of vengeance; for the support of the pious remnant, and to encourage repentance. The restoration from the Babylonish captivity, as the more recent mercy, and in every respect interesting and remarkable, would be more remembered than their ancient deliverance from Egypt: it was also typical of spiritual redemption, and of the future deliverance of the Church from antichristian oppression. But the gathering of the Jews from their present dispersions, and their restoration to their own land, seems also to be predicted. (Note, xxiii. 7, 8.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 16. 'Enemies and oppressors are elsewhere repre- 'sented under the metaphor of fishers and hunters, (Marg. 'Ref.) because they use all the methods of open force and 'secret wiles (often compared to nets,) in order to make 'men their prey.' (Their alacrity, perseverance, self-denying assiduity, and skilfulness in the work of destruction, may also be intended.) 'The Chaldeans shall make 'an entire conquest and booty of the whole land, of its 'inhabitants and their riches: and what shall escape one 'party shall fall into the hands of another.' (Lowth.)

V. 18. 'Double, in proportion to God's usual severity in punishing men's sins.' (Lowth.) Or, double, in proportion to his former dealings with the Jewish nation. He would fully execute his judgments on them before he began to show them mercy; (Note, Is. xl. 2.) Their idols, or the sacrifices, especially those of their sons and daughters, which they offered to idols, are called the carcasses of their abominable things.

V. 19—21. The prophet, hearing intimations of mercy, addressed the Lord as the Strength and Refuge of his people: he had revealed to his other prophets and to him, the calling of the Gentiles from all the ends of the earth; when they would renounce the idolatry of their fathers as unprofitable lies and vanity, to worship the God of Israel. And should not Israel be previously convinced of the folly and wickedness of making gods for themselves, which were no gods, but the cause of all their miseries? "Shall man, "(Adam,) make to himself gods," (ELOHIM?) (20.) God, (ELOHIM,) at first created Adam, and in him all mankind: how senseless then as well as abominable for man to attempt making a god, that is, an object of his own adoration and confidence! 'Shall that power, which is finite and weak, 'take upon him to make that which is infinite?' (Bp.

Hall.) Therefore the Lord determined, that he would by this one proof of his power and might, in the Babylonish captivity and the deliverance of the Jews from it, make them to know his name and effectually set them against idolatry. Yet the calling of the Gentiles was, and the future conversion of the Jews to Christianity, and restoration to their own land, will be, far more effectual for the destruction of idolatry, than any preceding events ever were.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The servants of God have continual occasion for self-denial in their implicit obedience: and he may very properly require them to forego the most innocent comforts of life, for his glory, and to render them instructive examples to the people. For he can make them more easy and satisfied in the situation allotted, than they who are not bound by such restrictions can imagine. None can be sure, that if they had children, or if their children were continued to them, they would add to their comfort; and many events may take place, which might cause them to wish that they had never been born, or that they had died in their infancy: so that entire resignation to the will of God in all these matters is our only wisdom. Peace, inward and outward, domestic and public, is wholly the work and gift of God, the result of his loving kindness and mercy: and when he takes his peace from any people, every kind of confusion and distress must follow. There may be circumstances, in which it may be proper to avoid those things which at other times are a part of our duty. In general it is good to go to the house of mourning; both in order to learn profitable lessons, and that we may counsel and comfort the afflicted, and give a religious turn to their sorrows. Yet times of public calamity may render such private regards unseasonable; and it behooves the servants of God by every means to show their abhorrence of sin, and their apprehension of the divine indignation against impenitent transgressors. But it is more generally expedient for them to withdraw from the house of feasting: especially when the Lord calls his people to mourn and sigh for the abominations and miseries which they witness. And indeed we should all sit loose to the pleasures and concerns of this life: for carnal mirth, yea, the most allowable causes of joy, will soon cease from impenitent sinners, or be turned into weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth. We cannot silence the objections of unhumbled sinners; they will persist in justifying and excusing themselves, and declaiming against the dispensations and threatenings of God, as unmerited and severe. But he will shortly show them and all the world their iniquities; for his eyes are upon them; none of their sins, or the aggravations of them, are hid from him: and then they will no more be able to object to the justice of their sentence, than to elude or resist the executioners of it; "for every mouth shall be stopped, "and all the world shall be found guilty before God." Thus will he recompense the sins of the impenitent on their own heads; but he will also exercise mercy to thousands and tens of thousands. Every public calamity shall promote the purity of his Church, every personal affliction the sanctification of the believer: succeeding remarkable interpositions in behalf of his people shall eclipse those that have preceded: till the fulness of the Gentiles shall come in, and all Israel shall be saved. The nations have often known the power of JEHOVAH in his indignation: but they shall at length know his name as the Strength and Fortress of his people, and their Refuge in the time of trouble. When sinners truly repent, they will renounce the vain practices delivered to them by tradition from their fathers; and not be content with unprofitable vanity and lies, because these were the portion of their progenitors. And these are indeed the only portion of all who do not come to the LORD, renouncing all for his sake, accepting of his salvation, and devoting themselves to his worship and service.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVII. V. 1, 2. (Marg. Ref.) The Jews persisted in denying or excusing their guilt: but the Lord declared that it was marked before him in as indelible characters, as if written with a pen of iron or an engraving instrument, and with the point of a diamond, which were employed to make the most durable inscriptions on the hardest substances. Their attachment to idolatry was so engraven on their hearts as not to be erased: and it was written in legible characters on the horns of the altars, which they dedicated to idols. Perhaps the name of the idol, and of him who erected the altar, used to be inscribed on its horns. Their children were early initiated in these abominations, and would be sure to remember their altars and groves as long as they lived: and thus idolatry was handed down to succeeding generations. Or this verse may be rendered, "As they remember their children, so "they remember their altars, &c."

V. 3, 4. Zion, "the mountain of the LORD's house," may here be put for Jerusalem. The city itself is elsewhere called "the valley, and the rock of the plain," (xxi. 13;) for it was surrounded with hills: but the whole together constituted a mountain, and the adjacent country a field in which it stood. This was sentenced to be plundered by the Chaldeans, and Judah himself, (or the nation of the Jews,) should be disseized for a long time of the inheritance which God had given him, and reduced to slavery in a foreign country: and though this national judgment would at length be terminated, the Lord's anger against their sins would burn like fire perpetually, nay, for ever, against the impenitent. The word rendered discontinue seems to refer to the sabbatical years: as these had long been neglected, the Lord determined to give rest to the land by the destruction or captivity of the inhabitants.

V. 5—8. The Jews were always prone to trust in powerful allies, or in their own strength; which emboldened them to disregard God and his denunciations of vengeance. A dreadful curse is therefore here pronounced against every one who trusteth in man: (Note, Ps. cxlvi. 3—5.) To expect safety, prosperity, or happiness, from any man, or number of men; to rely on their power, wealth, wisdom, valour, favour, and fidelity; and thus to neglect the promises, precepts, and ordinances of God, and to bestow more pains to obtain man's patronage and protection, than the divine favour; as if a prince could render him happy who has God for his enemy: by these things, and such as these, we "make flesh our arm;" and put a poor, frail, dying, sinful creature, in the place of our almighty and everlasting Protector and Helper. In so doing, "the "heart departeth from the LORD," and renounces its reliance on him. And as trusting in other men idolizes them; so reliance on our own capacity, knowledge, wisdom, strength, or righteousness, idolizes ourselves: and when this is habitual, it subjects a man to this curse. A person of this character resembles the heath, a sorry, sapless, worthless shrub, which grows in the barren desert, and withers for want of moisture; and whilst other plants, in more fertile soils, flourish by seasonable showers, this still continues the same, as doomed to grow in its native heartless soil. Thus he who trusts in man can never share the prosperity of God's people: he must remain destitute of divine grace, unfruitful, unholy, and contemptible, frustrated of all his expectations, liable to be deprived of all comfort, exposed to all misery, and excluded from the presence and favour of God, to inhabit the land where sin and sorrow dwell for ever. But he who trusts in the Lord, and expects every blessing from his mercy, grace, and providence, according to his word, is a happy man: he resembles a tree planted in a fertile soil on the bank of a river, which is not affected by heat or drought; but is covered with verdant leaves, and continues to bear fruit in the most unfavourable seasons. His profession and prosperity are permanent: he remains safe in every difficulty, and needs fear no event; for he shall not cease from bringing forth the fruits of righteousness to all eternity. (Notes, Ps. i. 3, 4. xcii. 12—14.) The clause, rendered "he "shall not see when heat cometh," is in the Hebrew text, and in the Septuagint, "he shall not fear, &c:" and this gives a clearer sense than the masoretic marginal reading.

V. 9, 10. The heart here means the dispositions and desires of the rational soul; the result of the understanding, will, and affections, reciprocally influencing each other. The heart, not of this or that man, but of fallen men in general, is declared "to be deceitful above all things, and "desperately wicked." Every man is naturally disposed to dissimulation, self-flattery, and hypocrisy, in an inconceivable degree; every man is liable to be imposed upon by his own heart; and this deceitfulness is more dangerous to him than any external artifice and deceit. The pride of the heart leads men to form false estimates of their real and comparative character and conduct, and to think far better of themselves than they deserve. The love of the pleasure and profit resulting from the favourite sin betrays every man into deception respecting its criminality, and his own guilt and danger: his understanding is thus bribed to frame excuses and palliations of it; he is led to call it by some soft name, and his conscience is thus seduced into connivance. The enmity of the heart to the holiness of God, and his righteous sovereignty, betrays men in a variety of ways into fallacious reasonings about his perfections, and their obligations to him: against the divine original of the sacred Scriptures, or against their obvious meaning: against the strict and spiritual precepts and awful sanctions of the law, against the humbling doctrines of the gospel or their holy tendency; and against the measure, rule, and consequences of the future judgment. To this deceitfulness of the heart all partial and erroneous decisions of the conscience are in a great measure to be ascribed; with the self-preference which is universal in all unconverted men; the strange propensity of the most atrocious criminals to palliate their vices, and to plume themselves on some imagined virtues; and the gross absurdity of men's boasting of the goodness of their hearts, when forced to allow of the wickedness of their lives; though they must be conscious that their wicked inclinations and imaginations have been immensely more numerous than their actual sins. From the same source springs the universal propensity of men to be confident in their hasty resolutions of amendment, under sudden terrors or pangs of conscience; though they have found them as changeable as the wind in all former instances. In a word, (for the detail would be endless,) the deceitfulness of the heart is the only cause that any man doubts of its being desperately wicked; and capable of any kind or degree of impiety, iniquity, enmity, cruelty, or sensuality that ever was committed or can be conceived. For the history of the world and of the Church, yea, universal experience and observation, demonstrate, that the heart of every man is naturally so wicked, that, were he left wholly to himself, in suitable circumstances of temptation, and gradual seduction from one thing to another, by the artifice of Satan, he is capable of deliberately committing any crime that ever was perpetrated on earth, and with every possible aggravation. But, like an artful villain, who conceals, that he may perpetrate his base purposes, the heart is so deceitful in its desperate wickedness, that it is wholly unsuspected by most men respecting themselves; even though they are aware of the artfulness and selfishness of other men, and suspicious of them to excess. But he, who believes the testimony of God, learns to watch his own heart, (as he would a servant, whom he was credibly assured was a concealed villain:) and he will in a course of years, and by a variety of painful experiences, comparing what passes in his mind with the divine law, and praying to be taught of God to know himself, infallibly learn the truth of this harsh and offensive decision in his own case; he will perceive that this is the exact picture of his own heart; and thence he will deduce many most important lessons to direct his conduct. But no man can penetrate to the depth of this desperate evil: the more the subject is studied, the worse will the heart of man appear: yet much must remain unknown both in our own hearts and those of others, which could only be discovered by our being actually placed in all the infinite variety of possible circumstances and temptations. As this cannot be done with any man, nor the result be made fully known to a finite understanding; so God alone, who knows entirely and searches thoroughly the heart of man, is perfectly acquainted with the extent of its desperate wickedness. And he proves and tries men's actions, to bring forth into practice what he sees in the heart, whether of the sin that is naturally there, or of the grace which he hath communicated; that his decisions may appear to his creatures, (what they uniformly are in themselves,) the result of infinite justice, wisdom, truth, and mercy. The Lord saw the hearts of the Jews to be more desperately rebellious than their conduct showed them; and this might be assigned as a reason of his severe judgments: and it is also a conclusive reason, that none should trust in men, but in God alone.

V. 11. What bird is meant by the original word, is not certainly known. Some understand the first clause to mean, that the bird in question sat on eggs which she had not laid, or those of a different species, and that the young left her when hatched; so that she had the confinement and fatigue of sitting on the eggs; but no compensating pleasure from the brood. But perhaps the partridge sits more frequently than other birds without hatching her eggs; as they lie upon the ground, and are exposed to a variety of accidents, which may render all her care and pains about them unavailing. Thus unjust men get wealth with much contrivance and many crimes, and then they are taken away in providence, perhaps in the prime of their lives: so that they are torn from their riches, having had little or no satisfaction in them; and their end proves their folly, though for a time they were deemed prudent and prosperous. This must have been the case of many Jews at the time of the captivity. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12, 13. The sanctuary of God was placed among the Jews, for a throne on which JEHOVAH was gloriously exalted, as their King and Protector; whence he displayed his power and majesty, in the works of mercy and special favour, which he from age to age wrought for them. Thus he was the Hope of Israel; and they needed not to have sought for any other helper. But this aggravated the guilt of those who forsook the Lord to follow idols, and to trust an arm of flesh, which was sure to end in confusion and disgrace. As Jeremiah was "the mouth "of God," they, who despised and departed from him, despised God also: and they would be debased and trampled on, as if their names were written in the dust, to be soon erased; their memory would be blotted out or rendered infamous; and they would have their portion on earth, and have no name in heaven. (Marg. Ref.) (Note, ii. 13.)

V. 14. The prophet seems to have been greatly discomposed by the ill treatment which he had received: so that he paused, in order to call upon God to heal his wounded spirit; to calm his mind, to subdue his sins, and to quiet his conscience; for he alone could do it effectually: he prayed that he would also save him from his enemies, and from the destruction of the wicked. He had hitherto worshipped and praised his name, he had gloried in him, and given him the glory of all his former mercies; and he was still purposed to praise and glory in him alone, as his complete Salvation.

V. 15—18. It greatly discomposed the prophet, that the people continued to treat his predictions with contempt and derision: they did not, and would not believe them to be the word of God till they were fulfilled, of which they saw no probability, and thus they even set the Almighty at defiance. But the prophet could appeal to God, that he had not been eager to leave the ordinary employment of a priest, or pastor of the flock, to follow him as a prophet: he had neither sought this honour for himself, nor been hasty in accepting of it. Or, as others interpret it, he had patiently continued in the execution of his office, as became a public teacher who was a follower of God; and had not been wearied out by their ill usage. The Lord could witness for him, that he had not desired the woful season which he predicted; but had continually pleaded for a reversal or mitigation of the sentence. He had faithfully adhered to his instructions; and had spoken what was right in the sight of God, and what he would verify: he therefore prayed, that he would not be a terror to him, seeing he was his only confidence in the day of evil. In the present confusion of his mind, Jeremiah seems to have had alarming apprehensions of the divine displeasure, or of being involved in the public calamities. But he prayed that he might be exempted from confusion and dismay, and that these might be the portion of his persecutors; and that the day of evil might overwhelm them with double destruction, as they had occasioned the ruin of the nation. V. 19—27. Some think that this message was delivered at the time of Josiah's reformation: because of the promises contained in it, which they think less suitable to the time when the captivity was absolutely decided on. But this is uncertain: for the Lord proved the people by one test after another, that their obstinate rebellion might be more evident; and he might properly make these conditional promises, though he foreknew that they would not perform the annexed condition. It is therefore probable, that the message was sent at a later period. The prophet was directed to lay before the king, rulers, and people of Judah, this command, and its sanctions, in the most public manner. Let them show their disposition to return to obedience, by observing strictly and enforcing the fourth commandment, and not doing or permitting any manner of work to be done on that holy day. (Notes, Exod. xx. 8—11.) Let them prevent any burden being carried by man or beast, and cause all secular employments to cease, according to the law given to their fathers, but obstinately broken by them; and let them take heed to themselves, for they were on their good behaviour; and if they diligently obeyed this word, their prosperity should be restored and established; the family of David should recover its pristine dignity; Jerusalem should never be subdued by any invader; and the temple should be preserved and frequented by the people, living in plenty, peace, and security, as in the best days of their pious kings. But if they refused obedience in this particular, the predicted vengeance would be inevitable. We cannot conceive any thing more decisive on the importance of hallowing the sabbath-day.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—13.

Though men violate the commands of God, without much reflection, yet every sin is marked in his book as with an iron pen; yea, they are all so graven upon the table of the heart, that they will be readily recognized by every man's conscience in the great day of retribution. Indeed, conscience frequently now reproaches the transgressor with his crimes, when he will not yield to conviction, but, as much as possible, imposes silence on that friendly monitor, and rushes into further sins. This is the effect of our natural and customary bias to evil, whence impiety and wickedness proceed, like water from a fountain: and as "the heart is deceitful above all things and "desperately wicked;" the fruit of our doings must of course be evil, as far as we are uninfluenced by the sanctifying Spirit of God, and in proportion as restraints are removed, and Satan hath permission to tempt us. That which is graven in the heart will become legible in the life: men's actions are only specimens of their desires and purposes; and as such they testify against sinners, and prove the justice of God in the punishments inflicted on them. Children are prone to forget good instructions, examples, and tuition: but they readily remember the vanity, vice, and folly, in which they have been trained up, or with which their memories and imaginations have been polluted. Thus one generation succeeds to the crimes of another; and the tendency of corrupt nature is from bad to worse; except as a prudent, cautious, and pious education of youth, and proper means used by parents, ministers, magistrates, and others, are rendered effectual by the blessing of God to counteract the tendency. This consideration may suggest many important duties to men in every order of society, for the good of their neighbours and that of the rising generation: whilst the conviction of the deceitfulness and desperate wickedness of the human heart will remind us, that "He, who trusteth in his own heart, is "a fool." What need have we then of deep humiliation before God! How entirely should we depend on his mercy and grace! How ought we to examine ourselves, to keep out of the way of temptation, to shun every occasion of sin, and to pray to be rendered victorious over every assault of the tempter! What cause have we to beg of God continually to search, and prove, and keep us, and not suffer us to be deceived by our own hearts; and to create in us a clean and holy nature by his Spirit? How jealous should we be of ourselves, distrustful of our resolves, and suspicious of our judgment in our own cause, or where our prejudices or interests are concerned! How thankful should we be for restraints, (even by poverty, pain, or sickness,) from acting out all that is in our hearts, to the misery and ruin, temporal and eternal, of ourselves and others! How thankful should we be for the salvation of Christ! And how patient under every trial that we meet with from the hand of God, or from the wickedness of our fellow sinners! For nothing but the divine interposition could make our lives tolerable in such a world as this; as it too plainly appears from the wars, persecutions, massacres, and other dreadful crimes and evils, which have desolated the earth: insomuch that every historian, who relates unvarnished facts, as effectually illustrates the scriptural doctrine of man's depravity, as if he had purposely set himself to do it! But whatever we suffer, or however we may be impoverished or enslaved by cruel enemies in a strange land: yet we shall be happy if we escape the fire of the Lord's anger, which will burn for ever. This cannot be done by those who trust in man, and expect health and happiness from their fellow creatures, or from themselves: for thus they remain impenitent and unbelieving, shut up under the curse of the law, and excluded from the grace of the gospel; they continue at a distance from God, the Fountain of living waters, and the Source of all wisdom, holiness, and felicity; and must be left for ever base and unholy, to associate with the enemies of God, in the regions of shame, misery, despair, and absolute unrestrained wickedness. What then will it avail them, if by their crimes and carnal confidences, they have accumulated wealth or lived in prosperity! When God shall cut them off, and say unto each of them, "Thou fool, this night "shall thy soul be required of thee, and then whose shall "those things be, which thou hast provided?" Nor can hypocrisy serve any other purpose but that of self-deception: "for the LORD knows, and searches the heart and "reins, to give every man according to his ways." Let us then seek happiness by trusting in him, accepting of his mercy, and walking before him in the humble obedience of love, and the patient submission of hope: that being planted in his courts, we may grow fruitful in righteousness, and flourish in unfading and ever increasing prosperity. For no changes or temptations can injure the root, destroy the fruit, wither the leaf, or even mar the beauty of those trees of righteousness, which the Lord hath planted for the glory of his name. May we then rejoice in the Hope of Israel; may our names be written in heaven, and our treasures there deposited!

V. 14—27.

Whatever wounds or diseases we experience in our hearts or consciences, let us apply to the Lord to "heal "us, that we may be healed; to save us, that we may be "saved," and that our souls may praise his name. His hands can bind up the troubled conscience, and heal the broken heart; he can cure the most inveterate diseases of our infected nature; and he can fill us with joy amidst contempt or persecution, and even in the agonies of death; and his righteousness and salvation are for ever. Thus applying to him for all the blessings of his grace; "exer- "cising ourselves to have a conscience void of offence "towards God and man;" and following him patiently and fully, all things will certainly terminate in our good. Trials all must meet with; and the ministers of Christ cannot escape the enmity or scorn of those, who despise and defy God himself: but if they have not rashly intruded into the sacred office; if they are now employed by him, and keep close to their instructions; if they continue to pray for the salvation of those whom they solemnly warn to flee from the wrath to come; if their words and works are right before God, they have nothing to fear, he will not be a terror but a comfort to them, and answer their hopes in every day of evil; and whilst they are delivered and graciously rewarded, their enemies will be dismayed and destroyed with aggravated ruin. The daring impiety of mankind appears exceedingly in the contempt which is generally shown to the commandment of hallowing the sabbath. The degree of strictness with which this ordinance is observed, is a good test of the degree of spiritual religion in any land. But by this rule, how awful is our condition in this nation, especially in the metropolis and its environs! A small number in proportion pay any decent respect to the Lord's day, or the ends for which it was instituted. Various secular employments, and some not fit to be tolerated on any day, are openly conducted on it: and probably more gross licentiousness and impiety are perpetrated on the Lord's day, than on all the rest. If this have a similar connexion with our national peace and prosperity as it had with those of Judah, we have abundant reason to take heed to ourselves, and to fear lest a fire should be kindled in our gates to devour our most magnificent palaces; in too many of which God's holy day is more daringly violated, than in almost any of the houses of the poor. And doubtless he may say of us also, "I commanded: but they obeyed not, neither inclined "their ear; but made their neck stiff, that they might not "hear, nor receive instruction." It behooves the ministers of religion in every place to sound the alarm in this respect, that all who go in and out at our gates may hear: and that rulers, magistrates, and all the inhabitants of the land, by their authority, influence, and example: by attention to their families, and by avoiding all intercourse with those who will not hallow the Lord's day, may combine to check the progress of this growing evil: that so, true religion may revive, general reformation may take place, our national prosperity be preserved and increased; and above all, that the souls of men may be led into the ways of eternal salvation.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVIII. V. 6. Indisputably the Lord had a more absolute property in his people, as their Creator and Governor, than the potter could have over the clay: yet

7 At what instant I shall speak concerning a nation, and concerning a kingdom, [e] to pluck up, and to pull down, and to destroy it;

8 If [f] that nation, against whom I have pronounced, turn from their evil, [g] I will repent of the evil that I thought to do unto them.

9 And at what instant I shall speak concerning a nation, and concerning a kingdom, [h] to build and to plant it;

10 If it [i] do evil in my sight, that it obey not my voice, [k] then I will repent of the good wherewith I said I would benefit them.

11 ¶ Now therefore [l] Go to, speak to the men of Judah, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, saying, Thus saith the LORD, Behold, I frame evil against you, [m] and devise a device against you: [n] return ye now every one from his evil way, and make your ways and your doings good.

12 And they said, [o] There is no hope; but [p] we will walk after our own devices, and we will every one do the imagination of his evil heart.

13 Therefore thus saith the LORD; [q] Ask ye now among the heathen, [r] who hath heard such things? [s] the virgins of Israel hath done [t] a very horrible thing.

14 Will a man leave * the snow of Lebanon which cometh from the rock of the field? or shall the cold flowing waters that come from another place be forsaken?

15 Because [u] my people hath forgotten me, they have [x] burnt incense to vanity, and they have [y] caused them to stumble in their ways from [z] the ancient paths, [a] to walk in paths, in a way not cast up;

16 To make their land [b] desolate, and [c] a perpetual hissing: every one that passeth thereby shall be astonished, and wag his head.

17 I will [d] scatter them as with an east wind before the enemy; I will [e] shew them the back, and not the face, in the day of their calamity.

the potter disposed of his clay as he pleased without control; but the people were ever ready to murmur against God, for his dispensations towards them. The case holds equally in respect of other nations, and of every individual. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7—10. The sovereignty of God is absolute, and he does not always show the reasons of his conduct; especially towards fallen sinners, who are as marred clay in his hand: but it is always in perfect wisdom, justice, truth, and mercy. This was here shown to be the case, in his providential government of the nations. If he sent his prophets to threaten any nation with desolating judgments for their sins, a reserve of mercy to the penitent was always implied. If then that nation, (as Nineveh did at the preaching of Jonah,) took the alarm, and by repentance and reformation sought to avert the impending storm, the Lord would certainly repent of the evil that he thought to do to them; that is, he would not execute the threatened vengeance. On the other hand, all promises of national prosperity, implied a requirement of obedience; and if a general apostacy from God and his service took place, the promised blessings would be revoked or withheld. (Note, Gen. vi. 6.) 'When the Scripture attributeth repentance 'unto God, it is not that he doeth contrary to that which 'he hath ordained in his secret counsel. But when he 'threateneth, it is a call to repentance: and when he 'giveth man grace to repent, the threatening, (which 'ever containeth a condition in it,) taketh not place: and 'this the Scripture calleth repentance; because it appear-'eth so to man's judgment.' 'Wherever repentance 'is ascribed to God, it must be meant only of a change 'with respect to the outward administrations of his provi-'dence, and his dealings with man otherwise than he did 'before.' (Lowth.)

V. 12. (Note, ii. 25.) The people either pretended that God was a severe Master, whom there was no hope of pleasing; and an implacable Enemy, whom there was no hope of pacifying; or that there was no hope of security or prosperity, if they renounced their idols, and heathen ordinances, and returned to his service: they were therefore determined to go on in their evil ways. "But they "said desperately, Surely we will walk after our own "imaginations; and every man after the stubbornness of "his wicked heart." (Old trans.) 'As men that had 'no remorse, but were altogether bent to rebellion, and 'to their own self-will.' Perhaps the people, contemptuously and profanely, used the prophet's own words concerning them, in expressing their avowed disregard to his exhortations: for it is not likely that they meant to own the wickedness of their hearts. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 13—17. (Note, ii. 9—13.) The heathen had not apostatized from their false gods, as the Israelites did from the true God. He had espoused the nation as a chaste virgin: but she had committed horrible adulteries. Common sense taught men to value clear waters, which, from the melted snows on Lebanon, were purified by running through the cavities of the rocks, and sprang up in the fields; or to prefer the cold spring-waters from any other place to the stagnant waters of some dirty pond or cistern; but Israel had forsaken the infinitely glorious JEHOVAH for 18 ¶ Then said they, [f] Come, and let us devise devices against Jeremiah; [g] for the law shall not perish from the priest, nor counsel from the wise, nor the word from the prophet. [h] Come, and let us smite him * with the tongue, [i] and let us not give heed to any of his words.

19 [k] Give heed to me, O LORD, and [l] hearken to the voice of them that contend with me.

20 Shall [m] evil be recompensed for good? for they have [n] digged a pit for my soul. [o] Remember that I stood before thee to speak good for them, and to turn away thy wrath from them.

21 Therefore [p] deliver up their children to the famine, and † pour out their blood by the force of the sword; [q] and let their wives be bereaved of their children, and be widows; and let their men be put to death; [r] let their young men be slain by the sword in battle.

22 Let [s] a cry be heard from their houses, when thou shalt bring a troop suddenly upon them: [t] for they have digged a pit to take me, [u] and hid snares for my feet.

23 Yet, LORD, [x] thou knowest all their counsel against me ‡ to slay me: [y] forgive not their iniquity, neither blot out their sin from thy sight, but let them be overthrown before thee: deal thus with them [z] in the time of thine anger.

worthless idols! and they had caused each other to stumble and turn aside from the ancient paths, in which their believing ancestors had walked, into such as were unauthorized, and which resembled the deep or rough road, through countries which are seldom travelled. For this sin and folly their land would soon be desolated, and exposed to the derision of every passenger: they would be left to flee before the enemy, as chaff or dust before the east-wind; and the Lord would turn his back on them, and show them no favour in their distress. The sixteenth verse is rendered differently by some translators; but the meaning is clear; and our translation seems preferable to such as are substituted in its place.

V. 18. When the prophet assured the people that the Lord devised devices against them, and called them to repentance, instead of obeying the call, they devised devices against him, and thus they showed their enmity against God. The prophet had denounced vengeance against the ungodly priests, rulers, and counsellors, and against the false prophets. (Marg. Ref.) But they were confident, that they should maintain their credit and authority, notwithstanding his predictions; and that their priests would be able to understand and handle the law, their wise men to give good counsel, and their prophets to speak the word of God to them. They therefore consulted together, to calumniate him, and to obtain false witnesses against him, that he might be condemned; and not to give any heed to his words. The chief priests and scribes had just the same objection to the doctrine of Christ and his apostles, and conducted their opposition exactly in the same manner.—'This argument the wicked have ever used against the 'servants of God. The Church cannot err; we are the 'Church; and therefore whoever speaketh against us 'ought to die. Thus the false church persecuteth the 'true Church, which standeth not in outward pomp, and 'in multitude; but is known by the graces of the Holy 'Ghost.' (Marg. Ref.)

V. 19, 20. The discovery of this conspiracy led the prophet to renew his complaints; and his prayers that the Lord would notice the malicious words of those who rewarded him evil for good. If the people would not attend to his words, he trusted the Lord would. They were secretly plotting against his life: but he, that searched the heart, knew that he earnestly prayed for their temporal and eternal salvation.

V. 21—23. 'Since they are thus incorrigible, I shall 'not any more intercede for them; but let those calamities 'of famine and sword, which thou hast threatened, over-'take them.' (Lowth.) 'Seeing the obstinate malice 'of the adversaries, which grew daily more and more; 'the prophet, being moved by God's Spirit, without and 'carnal affection, prayed for their destruction; because 'he knew that it should tend to God's glory and profit of 'his Church.' As several of the verbs are imperative, the language of prayer, rather than prophecy, it is not needful to maintain that no mixture of human infirmity discovered itself on this trying occasion; especially as we must allow this to have been the case in other instances. (xx. 15—18.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—10.

The servant of God may collect profitable hints from every object and occurrence: and nothing conveys truth more forcibly than apt illustration. We should unreservedly obey the commandments of God: and if we would hear his words, we must meet him according to his appointment. The great Creator and Lord of the universe hath an undoubted right and uncontrollable power to dispose of us and of all creatures, as he pleases: and this extends equally to nations and individuals, to our temporal and our eternal concerns. And as fallen creatures we are entirely without plea or claim, having forfeited all by sin. He may therefore, "according to the counsel of his own "will," either leave us to ourselves, as "vessels of wrath "fitted for destruction;" or cast us into a new shape, "as "vessels of mercy prepared before by grace for his eternal "glory." But this absolute sovereignty is always directed by unerring wisdom, and exercised with the most perfect justice, truth, goodness, and mercy: so that none have

The prophet is sent to Tophet, (with an earthen bottle, and attended by the elders;) to denounce the judgments of God on the Jews and on Jerusalem, and there to break the bottle as an emblem of their destruction, 1—13. He returns to the temple, and declares the same to the people, 14, 15.

THUS saith the LORD, [a] Go and get a potter's earthen bottle, and take of [b] the ancients of the people, and of the ancients of the priests;

2 And go forth unto [c] the valley of the son of Hinnom, which is by the entry of the * east gate, [d] and proclaim there the words that I shall tell thee.

3 And say, [e] Hear ye the word of the LORD, O kings of Judah, and inhabitants of Jerusalem; Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Behold, I will bring evil upon this place, the which whosoever heareth, [f] his ears shall tingle.

4 Because [g] they have forsaken me, and have [h] estranged this place, and [i] have burned incense in it unto other gods, whom neither they nor their fathers have known, nor the kings of Judah, [k] and have filled this place with the blood of innocents.

aught to fear from it, but the determined enemies of God; and none can object to it, without quarrelling with infinite perfection. What then can rational creatures deem preferable to his absolute dominion? what can a penitent sinner desire more, than the uncontrollable rule of infinite mercy? And who can pretend that encouragement should be held forth to the impenitent, as such? What need of limitations, when error and iniquity are impossible? Let us then "rejoice that the LORD reigneth," and "that his counsel "shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure:" let us leave secret things to him unto whom they appertain, and study to profit by what he hath been pleased to reveal. For it is as certain concerning individuals as nations, that no threatening, pronounced against the workers of iniquity, will exclude those from mercy, who repent and turn from their evil ways, and flee for refuge to the hope of the Gospel: and that no promises belong to those who turn aside from their profession, to do evil in the sight of God, and go on in disobeying his word; but he puts his fear into the heart of true believers, that they should not thus depart from him.

V. 11—23.

Sinners should be called on to take notice, that the Lord is framing evil and devising devices concerning them; which they cannot escape, except they return from their evil ways, and seek his grace, that they may make their ways and doings good. But some of them will answer, 'There is no fear, God is so merciful, that he will not 'punish;' others will say, 'There is no hope, for he is so 'strict and severe, that he cannot be pleased, and will 'not pardon;' while some verge alternately to presumption and despair, and in both determine to follow their own devices, and to walk after the imaginations of their own evil hearts. But the perversion or contempt of God's word, and the daring disregard shown to his precepts among professing Christians, are more horrible than any wickedness to be found among the heathen. Multitudes forget God, to follow lying vanities, and stumble from the ancient paths to walk in ways of their own devising. But he will disown those who have disowned him: and what will they then do in the day of judgment, and perdition of ungodly men? Yet, instead of taking warning by such awful denunciations, men frame devices against the faithful servants of God, who declare to them his whole counsel: and none are so violent and implacable in their enmity as false teachers, who are proud of their wisdom and reputation for sanctity: for the faithful preaching of God's word detects their hypocrisy and ignorance, undermines their credit and authority, and predicts their confusion and destruction. When sinners resolve not to regard the word of the Lord, it may be expected, that base slanders of his servants will form a prelude to bloody persecutions, except their malice be restrained by an invisible power. In such circumstances we should study to possess our souls with patience, and to give ourselves unto prayer: and it will be comfortable to reflect that we have earnestly sought, and fervently prayed for, the salvation of those who now revile or persecute us: but we must still continue to pray for, and not against, them. We may, however, declare that most tremendous punishments await such as recompense evil for good, and seek to destroy faithful ministers, or to entangle them in their snares, unless they repent of this atrocious wickedness. Nor can men commit any sin that tends more to bring down national judgments, or to entail misery on their posterity, as well as destruction on their own souls.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Man's unteachableness and unbelief render it proper to use a variety of methods to engage his attention; repetitions become unavoidable; and sometimes a mere circumstance may impress those, who remained unaffected under the most solemn warnings of the word of God. We ought therefore to avail ourselves of every proper expedient, and to observe every direction for that purpose.—They who stop their ears and harden their hearts against the threatenings of God, will not only have their ears made to tingle at the report of dire calamities; but their hearts filled with anguish and dismay, at feeling the truth of what they would not believe. The rulers, in church and state, are peculiarly concerned to know those things which relate to national sins and judgments: and it is proper to convey information and warning to the more careless, by means of such as are willing to attend to the word of God.—Men may often read their sins in their punishment: persecutors and oppressors commonly come to a dreadful and violent end; abused plenty often terminates in wretched penury; and children trained up in ungodliness become the misery of their offending parents. They, who despise God, must sink into contempt and ruin: and he will make void the counsels of all those who will not obey his commandments. The power of the mightiest nations is as easily broken by him as an earthen vessel; and he often destroys them so entirely, that none can make them whole: but he is chiefly to be feared, as "able to destroy both "body and soul in hell." That is a ruin that will never be repaired: but all other afflictions, personal or public, will work together for good to them, whom Jesus delivereth from the wrath to come.

NOTES.

CHAP. XX. V. 1—6. It might have been expected, that the prophet's plain dealing would exasperate the rulers of Judah, if it did not convince and humble them. Accordingly we have in this chapter an account of a persecution that he endured, and of his behaviour under it. Pashur, a priest of the race or order of Immer, (Marg. Ref.) who under the high priest superintended the affairs of the temple, having heard of the predictions which the prophet had delivered in Tophet, and perhaps being present when he repeated them in the temple, used his authority to punish and silence him, as a troubler of the nation. Having smitten or scourged him as a melefactor, he set him in the stocks, or the pillory, in a public part of the city, and left him there all night, exposed to ignominy as well as pain. This he probably thought would disgrace him with the people, and discourage him from prophesying any more. The prophet seems to have borne the indignity with silence and patience: but when at length Pashur came to set him at liberty, he was directed to inform him that God had named him Magor-missabib, or Terror round about: for he would cause him to be alarmed continually, through terrors of conscience and surrounding dangers: he should be so disquieted as to become a terror to himself and to his friends; and having seen some of them slain in the siege of Jerusalem, he and the rest should be carried captive to Babylon: there they should be slain before his eyes; and he should die, and be buried there, with all those whom he had deluded by his lies: for he was a false prophet, as well as a persecuting priest. Probably these predictions made such an impression on Pashur's mind, as to disturb his imagination during all the succeeding events, and to produce the predicted terror.

V. 7—9. The prophet here complains more bitterly than he had done before. The Lord had enticed him by his promises, (Note, i.) to undertake the prophetical office, and thus he was drawn in to engage: and now he found himself disappointed of the comfort and credit which he had expected. But if he meant to charge the Lord with having deceived him, he was not only very criminal, but very forgetful; for the Lord had told him, that the rulers and people of the land would fight against him, though they should not prevail against him. He complained also, that 10 For [r] I heard the defaming of many, fear on every side. [t] Report, say they, and we will report it. * All [u] my familiars watched for my halting, saying, Peradventure he will be enticed, and we shall prevail against him, and [x] we shall take our revenge on him.

11 But [y] the LORD is with me as [z] a mighty terrible one; therefore [a] my persecutors shall stumble, [b] and they shall not prevail: they shall be greatly ashamed; for they shall not prosper: [c] their everlasting confusion shall never be forgotten.

12 But, O LORD of hosts, [d] that triest the righteous, and seest the reins and the heart, [e] let me see thy vengeance on them: [f] for unto thee have I opened my cause.

13 Sing unto the LORD, praise ye the LORD; [g] for he hath delivered the soul of the poor from the land of evil-doers.

14 ¶ [h] Cursed be the day wherein I was born: let not the day wherein my mother bare me be blessed.

15 Cursed be the man who brought tidings to my father, saying, [i] A man-child is born unto thee; making him very glad.

16 And let that man be [k] as the cities which the LORD overthrew, and repented not: and [l] let him hear the cry in the morning, and the shouting at noon-tide;

17 Because [m] he slew me not from the womb; or that my mother might have been my grave, and her womb to be always great with me.

18 Wherefore [n] came I forth out of the womb to see labour and sorrow, that my days should be consumed with shame?

the Lord being stronger than he, constrained him even against his will, to continue in his work, though he met with daily derision and insult. From the beginning of his ministry, he had been urged with great vehemency, to reprove the oppression and iniquity of the people, and to predict that they would be given up to the violence and rapacity of their enemies. On this account the word of the Lord became the cause of continual reproach and derision to him: whereas had he spoken more agreeable things, he might have met with respect and favour. He had therefore determined to speak no more to the people concerning, or in the name of, God: but the convictions of his conscience, zeal for the glory of God, indignation at the sins, and compassion for the souls, of the people; and above all, the immediate impulse of the prophetic Spirit so urged him on, that he had no more ease than if a burning fire had been shut up in his bones; so that he was wearied out with forbearing, and could no longer refrain from delivering his message, though it exposed him to further trials.—'Herein appeareth the impatiency, which 'oftentimes overcometh the servants of God, when they 'see not their labours to profit, and also feel their own 'weakness. Thou didst thrust me forth to this work 'against my will. He thought to have ceased to preach; 'save that the Spirit of God did force him thereon.'—The word rendered deceived, is by some translated enticed, persuaded, and attracted. 'The power of divine grace 'attracts souls to God. Jeremiah alludes to the power of 'that call, by which he was attracted and drawn to the 'work of the ministry, which he exercised among many 'difficulties and contradictions.' (Evan. Mag.) The same verb is rendered enticed in the tenth verse.

V. 10—13. The prophet thought that he had reason to be weary of his work; when he heard every where those who reviled and terrified him: so that he became like Pashur, a terror to himself, for fear was on every side of him; (Marg. Ref.) His enemies encouraged each other to collect or invent calumnies against him, and engaged to circulate them. His most intimate acquaintance narrowly watched him, expecting to see him make some false step, which might afford them an advantage; nay, they endeavoured to entice him into some improper conduct, that they might prevail against him, and be revenged on him for his reproofs, and the uneasiness and terror of conscience that he had occasioned them. Whilst he was thus stating his case, his faith sprang into lively exercise; he felt himself assured of God's favour; he perceived that He was his mighty Defender, and a terrible Avenger of his enemies; he confidently predicted their confusion and ruin; he recollected that the Lord tried, that he might purify, the righteous; he had opened his cause to him, as his heart-searching Judge, and the Avenger of his enemies; and he exulted and praised God, and called on others to praise him, in the assurance of deliverance and victory. 'Here 'he showeth how his faith did strive against temptation; 'and sought to the Lord for strength.' (Marg. Ref.)

V. 14—18, (Notes, Job iii.) This is as extraordinary a transition as any in the whole Scriptures: and for aught that appears to the contrary, the prophet related what passed in his experience, according to the order in which it took place. An experimental acquaintance with our own hearts, as the variations of our affections under sharp trials, according as encouraging or discouraging thoughts occur to our minds, will best enable us to understand it. We should not think it possible for such rebellion and absurdity to prevail in the heart of a true believer, and to succeed the most vigorous exercises of faith, hope, and love; did we not meet with a few instances of the kind in the word of God; and they, who have been thus tempted of Satan, might be further urged to give up their hope, and to adopt the most desperate measures. Yet such thoughts and wishes are not to be excused: for they are strong proofs of

CHAP. XXI.

Zedekiah sends to inquire concerning Nebuchadrezzar's invasion, 1, 2. He is told that the city shall be destroyed, and that God would fight against both king and people, and show them no mercy, 3—7. He counsels the people to fall to the Chaldeans, as the only way of preserving their lives, 8—10. He exhorts the king and his family to execute justice, 11, 12. The city would certainly be destroyed, 13, 14.

the desperate wickedness of the heart. How absurd was it for a godly man to curse the day of his birth, which no longer had any existence, and was in no degree the cause of his sufferings! To curse the man who first informed his father of his birth, and even to wish him the doom of Sodom, or that the cry of terror and alarm might never cease to sound in his ears, because he would not murder him when a helpless infant! How strange to wish such an exquisitely cruel wish to his parent! And all this, because he was called to endure contempt and persecution for a short time, which would be counterbalanced by divine consolations, and terminate in everlasting felicity. So unreasonable are passion and impatience! 'How the chil-'dren of God are overcome, in this battle of the flesh and 'the spirit! And into what inconveniences they fall, till 'God raises them up again!' Some expositors endeavour to palliate the vehement expressions here used: but this is impossible; and could they effect their purpose, they would also counteract the very design of the Holy Spirit in recording them; viz. to show what the best of men are when left to themselves, and to preserve tempted believers from desponding when they are harassed in like manner.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

In this evil world, of which Satan is the god and prince, they that boldly stand up for the authority, truth, and righteousness of JEHOVAH, will certainly meet with persecution, in one form or another: and the plainer and more convincing the truth is made to the minds and consciences of sinners, the more violent will be their resentment, except the Lord powerfully restrain them, or change their hearts. Superior rank, affluence, reputation, and authority, will render men more apt to take umbrage at the humbling truths and sharp reproofs of God's word: and thus they who are exalted to do justice, preserve peace, and maintain truth, have often taken the lead in running down the cause of God, and in abusing his servants. The worthless caterers to men's vain pleasures, and the flatterers of their pride and passions, may expect favour, affluence, and distinction; but contempt and penury, dungeons, stripes, and the stocks, or more severe and bloody sufferings, have been the general recompense of those who have sought the salvation of souls! But the Lord can easily make those a terror to themselves and to each other, who attempt to terrify his ministers from their work, or to put them to silence and disgrace: no mitigation of the sentence can possibly be attained, by persecuting those who proclaim it: and lying prophets, and they who trust in them, will miserably perish together.

V. 7—13.

No opposition or ill treatment should deter the man of God from declaring his whole message: and indeed many have maintained their boldness and faithfulness in their public work, under the most perilous circumstances; who yet have been grievously baffled by Satan's temptations in their private experience, and led to wish they had never engaged in it, or that they could change their employment for some other. But they who put their hands to the plough, and look back, are not fit for the kingdom of God: and after all, the minister's work is in reality the most important, honourable, and useful service, that man can possibly perform. But they who are thus employed deceive themselves, if they expect worldly honour, and the friendship of men, from a faithful discharge of their office; nay, if they do not expect contempt, opposition, and injurious treatment, from the ungodly of every description. The Lord doth indeed allure men into the service, by giving them a hope of usefulness, and assurance of assistance and support: and few are at first aware of the extent and variety of those trials and difficulties, to which they will be exposed in the course of their ministry. So that when contempt, derision, or hard usage, tempt them to resolve that they will speak no more in his name, or that they will qualify their message, and render it more palatable, the Lord, being stronger that they, will prevail, and they will find "his word like a burning fire shut up in their "bones," and that no relief from their disquietude can be had, but by faithfully declaring the whole counsel of God. Thus "necessity is laid upon them, yea, wo unto them, "if they do not preach the Gospel." Indeed, were we only to speak of promises and privileges, and indiscriminately to deal out consolation, all would go on very smoothly: but if we are faithful, we must cry aloud, and not spare either ourselves or the people, either professed believers or opposers; we must reprove men's sins, and denounce the wrath of God against every one that doeth evil. Thus our earnestness alone will excite the derision and mockery of the profane; our faithful rebukes and warnings will exasperate the Pharisee and hypocrite. None will make any allowance for him, who will grant no indulgence to any man's sins: all around will watch for the halting of the bold reprover, and report with additions whatever they spy of imperfection in his conduct. Even the harmlessness of the dove, and the wisdom of the serpent, could not exempt him from defamation from those who want to be revenged on him, for the terrors of conscience which he has occasioned them. But God will be with and for his servants: he sees the uprightness of their hearts, and approves their conduct: let them then open their cause before him, and he will enable them to foresee the ruin of their implacable enemies, and their own complete

THE word which came unto Jeremiah from the LORD, [a] when king Zedekiah sent unto him [b] Pashur the son of Melchiah, and [c] Zephaniah the son of Maaseiah the priest, saying,

2 [d] Inquire, I pray thee, of the LORD for us; [e] (for Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon maketh war against us:) if so be that the Lord will deal with us [f] according to all his wondrous works, that he may go up from us.

3 ¶ Then said Jeremiah unto them, Thus shall ye say to Zedekiah:

4 Thus saith the LORD God of Israel; [g] Behold, I will turn back the weapons of war that are in your hands, wherewith ye fight against the king of Babylon, and against the Chaldeans, which besiege you without the walls, [h] and I will assemble them into the midst of this city.

5 And [i] I myself will fight against you [k] with an out-stretched hand, and with a strong arm, even in anger, and in fury, and in great wrath.

6 And [l] I will smite the inhabitants of this city, both man and beast: they shall die of a great pestilence.

7 And afterwards, saith the LORD, [m] I will deliver Zedekiah king of Judah, and his servants, and the people, and such as are left in this city from the pestilence, from the sword, and from the famine, into the hand of Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon, and into the hand of their enemies, and into the hand of those that seek their life: and he shall smite them with the edge of the sword; [n] he shall not spare them, neither have pity, nor have mercy.

8 ¶ And unto this people thou shalt say, Thus saith the LORD; Behold, [o] I set before you the way of life, and the way of death.

9 He [p] that abideth in this city shall die by the sword, and by the famine, and by the pestilence: but he that goeth out, and falleth to the Chaldeans that besiege you, he shall live, [q] and his life shall be unto him for a prey.

deliverance from the hands of all evil doers. And were it not for unbelief and sin, they might rejoice and praise the Lord, and encourage others to do the same, in the hottest fire of persecution. But, alas! how frail, mutable, and sinful is man in his best estate! How soon do our graces droop, and our corruptions revive, when we are left to ourselves! And how foolish, impious, and unnatural are the thoughts and wishes of our hearts, when we yield to impatience and discontent! Let us then "consider him "who endured the contradiction of sinners against him-"self, lest we be weary, and faint in our minds," under our lighter trials: let us beg of him to enable us to keep our hearts, and to bridle our lips under temptation. and let us accustom ourselves to view every object in the glass of eternity. For if we have a good hope of eternal happiness, we cannot allow ourselves to wish that we had never been born; or to complain of those light and momentary afflictions, which are "working for us a far more exceeding "and eternal weight of glory:" and if we have not a good hope, we have more important matters to engage our attention, and should be otherwise employed than in fretting about our present trials. But as our gracious God bears with and forgives the infirmity and folly of his servants, let us learn to sympathize with those who are struggling with similar temptations.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXI. V. 1, 2. We have been left to conjecture the time in which most of the preceding prophecies were delivered: but many of those which follow are dated. This chapter leads us forward to the time of Zedekiah, and very near to the captivity: yet we shall frequently be brought back to the preceding reigns. When Nebuchadrezzar had formed the siege of Jerusalem, Zedekiah was anxious to know the event: though it had been so often predicted, that nothing but the most determined incredulity could doubt of it. He was convinced, at some times at least, that Jeremiah was a true prophet, and he sent messengers to him on this occasion; who entreated him to inquire of the Lord, whether he would not appear for their deliverance, according to the wonders which he had formerly wrought for his people, that the siege might be raised: and perhaps they meant to desire his prayers. But they paid no regard to his warnings and exhortations, and made no attempts towards reformation, personal or public. 'Not that the king was touched with repent-'ance, and so sought to God, as Hezekiah did, when he 'sent to Isaiah: but because the prophet might pray unto 'God to take away this present plague; as Pharaoh sought 'unto Moses.' Pashur, here mentioned, seems to have been a different person, from Pashur, who put the prophet in the stocks.

V. 4. God would so order it, that the weapons of the Jews should hurt none but themselves.

Without, &c. Some think this message was sent, when the Chaldeans left the siege of Jerusalem to meet the Egyptian army: but this expression implies that the besiegers were then encamped against the city. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5. Fight against you. Namely, by pestilence and famine, as well as by the sword of the Chaldeans. The same expressions are used concerning the Lord's fighting against the Jews, as had formerly been employed in respect of his fighting for them against the Egyptians and their other enemies. (Marg. Ref.)

10 For [r] I have set my face against this city for evil, and not for good, saith the LORD: [s] it shall be given into the hand of the king of Babylon, and he shall burn it with fire.

11 ¶ And touching the [t] house of the king of Judah, say, Hear ye the word of the LORD;

12 O [u] house of David, thus saith the LORD; * Execute judgment [x] in the morning, and [y] deliver him that is spoiled out of the hand of the oppressor, [z] lest my fury go out like fire, and burn that none can quench it, because of the evil of your doings.

13 ¶ Behold, [a] I am against thee, O † inhabitant [b] of the valley, and rock of the plain, saith the LORD; which say, [c] Who shall come down against us? or who shall enter into our habitations?

14 But I will ‡ punish you [d] according to the fruit of your doings, saith the LORD: and I will kindle a fire [e] in the forest thereof, and it [f] shall devour all things round about it.

V. 9. If the king and his princes refused to surrender, the people were called on to provide for their own safety; which could only be done by going over to the Chaldeans. As this was the express command of God, it fully released them from all obligation to obey their rulers, who acted in avowed defiance of him.

For a prey. As a thing recovered from extreme danger.' Or, 'instead of spoil.' 'He ought to think 'himself a considerable gainer, by escaping with his life, 'in so general a destruction. (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11, 12. Some expositors suppose that a new prophecy is here begun, which was delivered long before the rest of the chapter. But there is not the smallest intimation given of this: and it was proper, even to the last, that exhortations to repentance and works meet for repentance should be given along with denunciations of wrath. The justice of God in punishing the obstinate rebels, who refused to hearken, would be thus more fully illustrated. And, though the destruction of the city, and the captivity of the nation, were absolutely determined; yet a variety of circumstances might exceedingly have mitigated the horrors of that catastrophe, especially to Zedekiah and his sons, had this exhortation been regarded. (xxxviii. 17—23. xxxix. 6, 7.) The wickedness of Zedekiah and his sons, and that of the princes of that line, was aggravated by their relation to David. They probably trusted in the covenant of royalty, whilst their crimes forfeited their personal interest in it: and the exhortation implied a severe reproof of Zedekiah's conduct, as guilty of abuse of power and neglect of duty. But let him and his princes immediately and earnestly set themselves to execute justice, and deliver the oppressed: let them do it "in the "morning," as their first concern, at that time when their courts were held, and every morning: or else the Lord's anger would burn unquenchably against them.

V. 13, 14. 'Jerusalem was builded part on a hill, and 'part in the valley, and was compassed about with moun-'tains.' (Note, xvii. 3.)—'They confided in the strength 'of the place, as the Jebusites had formerly done.' (Lowth.) Indeed the city was thought impregnable, and therefore the inhabitants flattered themselves that they should escape; for none would be able to enter their walls, though the adjacent countries should be wasted. But the Lord declared that he was against them, and would destroy them. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The most obstinate sinners, yea, the most virulent persecutors, have seasons of compunction, and are sometimes convinced that their faithful reprovers are wiser and happier than they. So that, in seasons of urgent distress and peril, men frequently desire the counsels and prayers of the very persons, whom at other times they despise or oppose: and thus the servants of God pass "through "honour and dishonour, through evil and good report." But such men only inquire after deliverance from punishment: if the Lord would deal with them according to the riches of his power and mercy, in saving them from suffering, and then leave them to indulge themselves in sin, they would be reconciled to him and to his ministers; and they will meet with teachers, who will encourage them upon this plan, for a valuable consideration to themselves. But the faithful servant of God is zealous for his Master's honour, and adheres to his instructions: he can encourage no man who refuses to repent and to do works meet for repentance: he will stand to it, that they who hate the precepts have no interest in the promises of God; and that he will never deal with hypocrites according to the wonders which he performs for his people. When they who stand out in obstinate disobedience would presume on external privileges, let them be told, that God will prosper his open enemies against them; nay, that he will baffle all their efforts, and fight against them by his own out-stretched arm, and not spare them, or show them any favour. Yet intimations of mercy are couched under the severest denunciations: and in the most tremendous public calamities, there is hope for individuals of escaping the wrath to come. No sinner on earth is absolutely left without refuge, who desires to avail himself of one: life and death are continually set before men; but the way of life is humiliating, it requires self-denial and singularity, and exposes men to difficulty and reproach. Few therefore choose it: but most persist in that course against which the most awful vengeance of God is denounced. In all possible circumstances, the way of duty is the safest and most advantageous; and will tend to alleviate those miseries which cannot be entirely avoided. When sinners therefore inquire about events, they should be directed to the duties of their stations: they, who are descended from pious ancestors, should be exhorted to imitate them; and they who are placed in authority, should be reminded to execute justice and do good: otherwise such distinctions will the more expose men, when "the fury of the LORD "goeth forth like fire, and burneth, that none can quench "it because of the evil of their doings." He sets himself especially against those who presumptuously defy his threatenings: and he will let them know, that none of their carnal confidences can withstand the power of his righteous indignation.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXII. V. 1. Some interpreters suppose that this chapter contains two distinct messages, the one sent to Jehoiakim, and the other afterwards to Jeconiah or Jehoiachin his son: but there is in it no intimation of this. Others suppose, that the whole chapter was addressed to Jeconiah: and that the former part was a recapitulation of messages formerly delivered to Jehoiakim: but there is great difficulty in applying the conclusion of the address to Jeconiah. It hath therefore been supposed by a few interpreters, that the whole was addressed to Zedekiah, and that it is a continuation of the subject of the preceding chapter. This interpretation I accede to: but without being very confident in so doubtful a matter. If this point could be ascertained, the difficulties would vanish, which upon other interpretations are almost, if not quite, insuperable; as will be shown: but there is no evidence on either side, except the chapter itself compared with the context; of which the reader will judge for himself. Yet it seems very reasonable to expect, that after Jeremiah had answered Zedekiah's inquiries by his messengers, the Lord should send him in person to confirm and enforce his word, in the manner here recorded: and the abrupt opening of the chapter, as well as its coincidence with the preceding, favours his opinion. We suppose then, that Zedekiah is addressed; and that the names of the other kings are introduced, by way of reminding him that the predictions concerning them, which they had disregarded, had been exactly accomplished; and from this to infer, that those which related to him and the approaching captivity would be so likewise. Coniah indeed is last mentioned in the chapter, and Zedekiah is not named in it; but he had been mentioned in the former part of the subject, as the foregoing chapter is supposed to have been: and being here addressed in person as king of Judah, it was not necessary to address him by name.

V. 2—5. (Marg. Ref.) 'This was his ordinary 'manner of preaching before kings, from Josiah to Zedekiah, which was about forty years.' The prophet repeats to Zedekiah the admonitions which he had given to his predecessors, connected with similar promises and denunciations: and the express declarations made in other places, that the city would be taken and destroyed, implied that God certainly foreknew Zedekiah's obstinate disobedience. Thus the Lord again and again sent Moses to Pharaoh, to demand the liberty of Israel, though he knew and foretold that Pharaoh would not let them go till forced to it. (Note, xxi. 11, 12.)

V. 6. The palace of the kings of Judah was become very magnificent; it had been favoured more than the residence of other kings, and made pre-eminent by its vicinity to the temple; and the royal family had been equally favoured and exalted by the covenant with David and his seed: but having been polluted with idolatry and iniquity, they were condemned to be destroyed and made desolate. Gilead was renowned for rich pastures, and Lebanon for stately cedars. (Marg. Ref.) against thee, every one with his weapons: and they shall [p] cut down thy choice cedars, and cast them into the fire.

8 And [q] many nations shall pass by this city, and they shall say every man to his neighbour, Wherefore hath the LORD done thus unto this great city?

9 Then they shall answer, [r] Because they have forsaken the covenant of the LORD their God, and worshipped other gods, and served them.

10 ¶ [s] Weep ye not for the dead, neither bemoan him: but [t] weep sore for him that goeth away; for he shall return no more, nor see his native country.

11 For thus saith the LORD touching [u] Shallum the son of Josiah king of Judah, which reigned instead of Josiah his father, which went forth out of this place; He shall not return thither any more:

12 But he shall die in the place whither they have led him captive, and shall see this land no more.

13 ¶ Woe [x] unto him that [y] buildeth his house by unrighteousness, and his chambers by wrong; that useth his neighbour's service without wages, and giveth him not for his work;

14 That saith, [z] I will build me a wide house, and *large chambers, and cutteth him out † windows: and it is [a] ceiled with cedar, and painted with vermilion.

15 Shalt thou reign, because thou closest thyself in cedar? did not [b] thy father [c] eat and drink, [d] and do judgment and justice, and [e] then it was well with him?

16 He [f] judged the cause of the poor and needy; then it was well with him: [g] was not this to know me? saith the LORD.

17 But [h] thine eyes and thine heart are not but for thy [i] covetousness, and for [k] to shed innocent blood, and for oppression, and for ‡ violence, to do it.

18 Therefore thus saith the LORD concerning Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah; [l] They shall not lament for him, saying, [m] Ah my brother! or, Ah sister! they shall not lament for him, saying, Ah lord! or, Ah his glory!

19 He shall be buried [n] with the burial of an ass, drawn and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem.

V. 10—12. The ruin of the kingdom of Judah commenced by the death of Josiah: the prophet therefore recurred to that event, and referred to predictions that were delivered soon after, when Jehoahaz, or Shallum, had been carried away captive into Egypt by Pharaoh-necho, the people had great cause to mourn their own loss in Josiah's death; and for their sins, which had provoked the Lord to remove him: yet they needed not bemoan him, as if he had suffered loss by being "taken "away from the evil to come," for he died in reputation, and at peace with God. But they had a more recent cause for sorrow in the captivity of Shallum, who was doomed, for his early wickedness, to live and die a captive in Egypt, and never more to return to his own land. The people, it seems, did not believe this prediction at the time when it was uttered: but it had been exactly verified. And this very properly came in to confirm the predictions that were afterwards delivered, and which were treated with similar disregard. We must adopt this interpretation, whether we suppose Jeconiah or Zedekiah to be addressed. 'I 'shall lay it down as most probable that Shallum, men-'tioned in the text, is the same as Jehoahaz: for the cha-'racters here set down can agree with no other. It was 'he that reigned instead of his father Josiah. He like-'wise was carried captive, and never returned.' (Lowth.) —Some indeed think the Shallum mentioned in Chronicles cannot be the same; because they conclude from the historian's language that he was younger than Zedekiah; but Jehoahaz was older than he. (Note, 1 Chr. iii. 15.)

V. 13—19. These verses evidently relate to Jehoiakim, who succeeded his younger brother Jehoahaz, or Shallum; but whether they were, on this occasion, addressed to him, or whether they were adduced in confirmation of other predictions, is not agreed. According to the interpretation here adopted the case of Jehoiakim was recurred to, to convince Zedekiah that the prediction uttered against him and Jerusalem would certainly be accomplished. Jehoiakim it seems built a magnificent palace in those calamitous times, the expense of which exceeded his finances: and this introduced a system of iniquity and oppression. He constrained his subjects to work without wages, and never paid for the materials; and in various ways he committed extortion and injustice. 'A crying sin, and too common 'among the great men of the world.' (Lowth.) But did he think that his house of cedar would secure his authority, or prolong his reign? His pious father affected not such splendour; but he lived in plenty and hospitality, without injuring any of his subjects: and his clear conscience and character, the love of his people, and above all the favour of God, were far preferable to Jehoiakim's guilty and odious magnificence. Moreover Josiah was the patron of the poor, and his throne was established in righteousness: and his obedience to God, and imitation of his justice, truth, and goodness, in the exercise of his authority, proved that he knew and loved him. But Jehoiakim was continually looking out for opportunities of gratifying his abominable avarice; in pursuit of iniquitous gain, he committed murder and every kind of oppression; and thus he became odious to his subjects: so that it was predicted, that when he should be prematurely cut off, his relations would not grieve for him as a brother, nor his people as a ruler, nor would any lament that his glory was turned into ignominy: and after his death his body would be treated with the utmost contempt, and buried with the burial of an ass; which creatures, when they died in the city, would be dragged forth to some place without the gates, where rubbish was thrown, there to be devoured by dogs, or to putrify above ground. We read that Jehoiakim was taken prisoner by Nebuchadnezzar, and bound in fetters, to be carried to Babylon; (2 Chr. xxxvi. 6. Ez. xix. 9:) and Josephus relates that he was slain, and his body left unburied. But as the gates of Jerusalem seem to relate to the burial of the ass, and not that of Jehoiakim, it matters not to inquire whether this took place near Jerusalem, or at Babylon. Doubtless the exact fulfilment of the prediction was well known at Jerusalem: and the event might therefore very properly be adduced, in confirmation of the prophet's other warnings to the king and people of Judah.

V. 20—23. These verses seem to relate to the nation at large, and may be considered as the prophet's address to them on the success of the Chaldeans, and their disappointment of assistance from Egypt. They might now betake themselves to Lebanon or Bashan, or the other entrances into the land, to lament their miseries, and cry for help: but none would regard them; for all their idols and idolatrous allies were about to be destroyed by the power of the conqueror. The Lord had warned them of these calamities in their more prosperous days, and commanded them to repent of their sins; but they were avowed and obstinate in rebellion: and this had been the manner of the nation from the beginning, that they would not obey his voice. Therefore all their rulers and teachers would perish, as the fruits of the earth are blighted by an unwholesome wind; and their allies will go with them into captivity, being reduced by the same power. They thought themselves indeed as safe in Jerusalem, as the eagle in her nest, on the top of a cedar upon the summits of Lebanon; and therefore they despised the word of God: but destruction was coming as pangs on a woman in travail; and then they would show some regard to the Lord, and assume the appearance of humility, devotion, or of mercy to their oppressed brethren; but it would not prevent their ruin.

V. 24—27. After the removal of Jehoiakim, Jeconiah reigned for a short time, and was then taken prisoner and carried to Babylon; where he continued many years before his death. He is here called Coniah, in contempt, as it is generally thought: the first syllable of his name, being a part of the name of JEHOVAH, is cut off, perhaps as an intimation that the Lord no longer owned him. As he was the lineal heir of the house of David, it might have been thought that God would have taken special care of him: but he sware by himself, that even were Coniah to him like the royal signet on the right hand of a king, his ornament and a peculiar badge of authority, he would pluck him off, and cast him away with disdain; and that he should end his days in captivity, with his mother, who had brought him up in iniquity, and with the rest of his family. (Marg. Ref.) seed shall prosper, [a] sitting upon the throne of David, and ruling any more in Judah.

CHAP. XXIII.

A wo is denounced on the corrupt pastors, and the restoration of the scattered flock is predicted, 1—4. A prophesy of the kingdom and righteousness of Christ, and of the gathering of the people to him, 5—8. The wickedness of the nation laid to the charge of the priests and false prophets, 9—15. The people cautioned against hearkening to the false prophets, and instructed how to distinguish them; with sharp rebukes and terrible threatenings against them, 16—32. A rebuke of those who made a scoff at the words of true prophets, 33—40.

V. 28—30. This is the application of the whole address, which is here supposed to have been made to Zedekiah. Indeed Jeconiah is spoken of as absent, and as already in captivity. Now, had he been thrown aside as a broken idol, or a vessel which a man cares not to make use of? Wherefore was he and his seed carried captive to Babylon? Was it not for their sins? And did Zedekiah, who copied and far exceeded them, expect to prosper on the throne of David? If he would pay no regard to the word of God, let the earth itself hear and record it: for the Lord had determined, that this man, (to whom the prophet addressed himself,) should die childless, and be unsuccessful all his days; and that none of his seed should prosper, filling the throne of David, and ruling over Judah; as he had vainly expected, after his nephew Jeconiah was carried captive. If we understand this of Zedekiah, all is very easy: he was taken prisoner by Nebuchadrezzar, his sons were slain before his eyes, then his eyes were put out, he was carried to Babylon, and we read no more of him or his posterity. But if we apply it to Jeconiah, we are involved in difficulties. He certainly left several sons; (Marg. Ref.) Zerubbabel his grandson possessed great authority, and prospered ruling in Judah. Jeconiah's name stands in the genealogy of our Lord, as one of the line of David, from whom Joseph the husband of Mary was descended. Nay, Jeconiah himself may be said to have prospered towards the close of his days. (2 Kings xxv. 27—30.) So that this sentence seems not to have been executed, respecting him, in any measure answerable to the peculiar solemnity with which it was denounced. To obviate these difficulties, some conjecture that Salathiel, the father of Zerubbabel, was only the adopted son of Jeconiah: but it is expressly said, that "he begat him," which can hardly mean less than that he was his ancestor; (Matt. i. 12. Note, 1 Chr. iii. 17:) and such an interpretation would reduce the genealogy of Christ, and indeed all other genealogies, to uncertainty. Others suppose, that the sentence only meant that he should not see any comfort in his children, and that they should not succeed him on the throne; but that, after the death of Zedekiah, the temporal kingdom of David should terminate: but the word rendered childless occurs only in two other places; and both seem to confirm our translation of it. (Gen. xv. 2. Lev. xx. 21.) And certainly Zerubbabel ruled prosperously in Judah, though he did not sit on the throne of David. As to the opinion, that the Salathiel and Zorobabel, in the line of Nathan, must be the same as the Salathiel and Zerubbabel in the line of Solomon; though neither their ancestors nor their descendants were the same; nothing, but the countenance and sanction of so many learned men, could entitle it to any degree of attention.—For the coincidence of names in the same nation and the same family is so very common in all history, that one cannot but wonder to see so much built upon it in this instance. But having suggested what appears to me the most obvious method of removing the difficulty, I shall only add, that there seems a peculiar propriety in the prophet's thus adducing former instances of the Lord's performing his predictions, as an introduction to passing this solemn sentence of condemnation on him, under whose government, and through whose obstinacy, Jerusalem was destroyed, and the people carried into captivity.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—12.

The mightiest princes are as much concerned to hear the word of God, as their meanest subjects; and they who are called to speak to them, in the name of God, should deal plainly and faithfully with them: as their servants and people are deeply concerned in their conduct, and are generally influenced by it. No durable prosperity in any station can be obtained without obedience to God's commandments. Nor can real religion subsist, without justice, truth, and mercy, in our relative conduct. They who are intrusted with authority, are under the greatest obligations to imitate our God, in patronizing the poor and rescuing the oppressed: and innocent blood shed by them, under colour of law, or by iniquitous wars, must be as exactly accounted for, as that which their inferiors shed in violation of their statutes. The neglect of these things exposes nations to the righteous vengeance of God: and he alike disregards temples and palaces, when they who frequent or possess them will not obey his word. He neither destroys cities, nations, nor individuals, except for their sins; and in this world he often makes it obvious to every one, for what crimes he inflicts punishment: but this will be fully manifest to all the world, at "the day of judg-"ment and perdition of ungodly men." They who have escaped from this world of sin and sorrow, and are safely arrived at the mansions of the blest, may more reasonably be envied than lamented: and their happiness should reconcile survivors to the loss they have sustained. But impenitent sinners, living or dying, are objects of our compassion or lamentation. Speedily death will remove the most prosperous from their good things here, and their place will know them no more; and they have a place of torment prepared for them in the eternal world. Yet others

V. 13—30.

Men fancy that wealth, magnificence, elegant mansions, furniture, paintings, and such splendid vanities, give happiness to their possessors: and in order to acquire them they commit the most atrocious crimes, and expose themselves to the severest vengeance of their offended Judge. How many houses have thus been builded by unrighteousness! How many live in magnificence and luxury, by oppressing and defrauding the poor; and by constraining them to excessive labour, without giving them any adequate compensation for their work! How many thus run into debt, cheat their creditors, and ruin honest families, to gratify their infamous ostentation! And indeed all, who determine to be rich or luxurious at all adventures, will fall into such temptations, and be betrayed into some species of injustice. Generally, the pride and vanity of young persons, in wanting to make a more genteel and elegant appearance than their prudent or pious parents, prove them defective in more valuable accomplishments; especially if their circumstances are not more affluent. It is unspeakably more respectable and comfortable to have food and raiment, and other accommodations in a plain style, with honesty and piety; and to use hospitality, be friendly to the poor, and to have an interest in their prayers, than to fare sumptuously, to lodge magnificently, to be surrounded with numerous servants and visitants; whilst extravagance puts an edge on rapacity, and the eyes and heart are only after covetousness, oppression, and other crimes, which luxury renders necessary. They who know God will do justice and love mercy; and it will be well with them living and dying; but they who dishonour him will be disgraced: and when ostentatious and oppressive rulers are removed, and none lament their death, it is an awful token that they are gone to receive the due recompense of their crimes. Such as, in prosperity, will not hear the voice of God by his word, must expect to feel the strokes of his correcting rod; and, (if this doth not produce a salutary effect,) to be overwhelmed and confounded by his awful judgments: then all helpers and confidences will fail; and the perishing transgressors will cry for mercy, and not be heard, when sudden destruction cometh upon them, as pangs upon the travailing woman. Indeed it has been too much the way with all of us from our youth, that in prosperity and health we would not obey the voice of God: and when visited with chastisements, we have many of us repeatedly appeared very gracious, and made many professions and resolutions of amendment, which we have broken, as soon as our danger was past, and the terror worn off. Yet the Lord often blesses affliction as a means of bringing sinners to repentance. Alas, how little is earthly grandeur to be depended on, or flourishing families to be rejoiced in! Soon the greatest may be thrown down into the most abject misery; and children may be torn from us in the most distressing manner: nor can any external relation to God secure a man from being given into the hands of that enemy who seeks the life of our souls. But they who "hear the voice of Christ, and "follow him, have eternal life, and shall never perish, "neither shall any enemy pluck them out of his almighty "hands." May this be our character, our honour, and our felicity!

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIII. V. 1, 2. Israel was the flock of God, for which he had taken special care, and on which he had set a peculiar value. Judah was at that time his visible Church, in which there was a remnant of true believers; and from that people the promised Saviour was at length to arise: and the king, his counsellors and chief officers, with the high priest, the chief priests, and those in authority under them, were the pastors or shepherds, who were appointed to feed and protect the flock, both in respect of their temporal welfare and their spiritual estate. But the oppression and persecution of the civil rulers, their neglect of duty, and their bad policy, tended to destroy the people, to expose them to the sword of their enemies, to drive them to seek shelter in foreign countries, and to reduce them to captivity; so that their wickedness ended in the desolations of the land, and the scattering of the people among the heathen: while the ignorance, negligence, false doctrine, and wickedness of the priests, were equally ruinous to their souls. Thus they abused their trust, and were condemned to be deposed and punished for their crimes.

V. 3, 4. These verses contain a promise of the restoration of the remnant of the Jews, and their re-establishment in their own land; and of their increase and prosperity, under the government and instruction of Zerubbabel, Joshua, Ezra, and Nehemiah; who ruled over them in the fear of God, and under whom they lived in a measure of peace and confidence: yet their full accomplishment must be referred to the times of the gospel, to the true flock of Christ, and to their entire safety and holy confidence in him. (Note, xxxii. 37.)

5 Behold, [f] the days come, saith the LORD, that [g] I will raise unto David a righteous [h] Branch, and a King shall [i] reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth.

6 In [k] his days Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall [l] dwell safely: [m] and this is his name whereby he shall be called, * THE LORD OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS.

7 Therefore, behold, [n] the days come, saith the LORD, that they shall no more say, The LORD liveth, which brought up the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt;

8 But, The LORD liveth, which brought up, and which led the seed of the house of Israel out of the north country, and from all countries whither I had driven them; [o] and they shall dwell in their own land.

9 ¶ Mine [p] heart within me is broken because of the prophets; all my bones shake; I am [q] like a drunken man, and like a man whom wine hath overcome, because of the LORD, and because of the words of his holiness.

10 For the land is [r] full of adulterers; for [s] because of † swearing [t] the land mourneth; [u] the pleasant places of the wilderness are dried up, and their ‡ course is evil, and their force is not right.

11 For [x] both prophet and priest are profane; yea, [y] in my house have I found their wickedness, saith the LORD.

12 Wherefore their way shall be unto them [z] as slippery ways in the darkness: [a] they shall be driven on, and fall therein: for I will bring evil upon them, even [b] the year of their visitation, saith the LORD.

V. 5, 6. The time would speedily approach, when, instead of the degenerate branches from the stock of David, who had brought Judah to ruin, a righteous Branch would spring from him, who would reign in prosperity, and execute justice in the land and throughout the earth. (Note, xxii. 30.) Under his government, the people of God, being saved from wrath and sin, and protected from their enemies, would dwell in peace and safety: and men would call this Branch of David "JEHOVAH our Righteous-"ness." (xxxiii. 15, 16. Isaiah xlv. 24, 25.) Though descended from David according to the flesh, he would be indeed JEHOVAH, God in human nature, One with the Father: and he would be called by believers "Our right-"eousness;" for they are "made the righteousness of "God in him." His obedience unto death is their justifying righteousness, and title to heavenly felicity; and their inherent righteousness, their sanctification, the source of all their personal obedience; and their meetness for heaven is the effect of their union with him, and of the supply of his Spirit. As therefore Christ is JEHOVAH, and in every sense OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS, it were absurd to think of any other interpretation than this, which is so evidently the grammatical meaning of the text, and so coincident with the whole tenour of Scripture. (Marg. Ref.) 'The 'prophets generally join Judah and Israel together, as 'equally sharers in the blessing, and no more two but one 'people. (xxx. 3. xxxi. 1. l. 4. 20. Is. xi. 12. Ez. xxxvii. '16—22. Hos. i. 11. Zech. x. 6.' 'The title of JEHOVAH 'is elsewhere given to the Messias by the prophets. Is. xl. '10. xlviii. 17. Hos. i. 7. Zech. ii. 10, 11.' (Lowth.)

V. 7, 8. (Note, xvi. 14, 15.) These words, as repeated in this connexion, imply that the Jews, when converted to christianity, will be restored to their own land.—'This wonderful word of God, in restoring the Jewish 'nation after their dispersions all the world over, (toge-'ther with the bringing in the fulness of the Gentiles, 'which will likewise be brought to pass by this means,)—'will so far exceed the miracles which he wrought in their 'deliverance out of Egypt, that this latter will not deserve 'to be compared or mentioned with the former. St. Paul 'calls this restoration of the Jews "life from the dead." (Rom. xi. 15.) (Lowth.)

V. 9—12. The prophet, having predicted the coming of Christ, and many future blessings in reserve for the Church, for the encouragement of the faith and hope of the pious remnant, here returns to reprove, convict, and pass sentence on his contemporaries. His heart was broken with sorrow, and his frame was most violently agitated, to see the people so deluded by the false prophets: and he was so filled with amazement and zeal, that he spake with vehemency and incoherency, and acted with impetuosity like a drunken man, when he considered the justice and power of God as armed against the nation, and the holy denunciations of his vengeance which he had been sent to proclaim; or when he compared the precepts and sanctions of the law with the crimes of the people. For the whole land swarmed with adulterers, and profane and perjured persons: for which iniquities the Lord had begun by drought and famine to punish the land, and had burnt up her pleasant pastures. But they still proceeded in their evil course, and did wrong with impetuous violence, and with all their power. In this impiety the prophets and priests were the ringleaders; nay, they chose the temple as the scene of their enormities: and therefore the Lord, who witnessed their crimes, condemned them to be driven forward in their ruinous ways into final destruction; as those who are driven headlong on slippery paths in the dark, till they are cast down some precipice and dashed in pieces. (Marg. Ref.)

15 Therefore thus saith the LORD of hosts concerning the prophets; Behold, [k] I will feed them with wormwood, and make them drink the water of gall: for from the prophets of Jerusalem is ‡ profaneness gone forth into all the land.

V. 13—15. The false prophets of Samaria, who had foolishly and impiously prophesied in the name of Baal, deluded the Israelites into those idolatries that ruined the nation: yet the Lord considered the false prophets of Jerusalem who prophesied lies in his name, as guilty of more horrible and abominable wickedness. For they were abandoned to adultery and deceit; and their prophesying was a constant imposture, by which the people were hardened and emboldened in iniquity, in the expectation of peace and prosperity; and prejudiced against the true prophets, who called on them to return from their wickedness. Thus the whole nation were become as odious to the Lord as the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah; and would soon be visited with judgments almost as tremendous. But the prophets would be constrained to drink the most bitter part of this cup of God's indignation; as their false doctrine, pretended visions, and corrupt examples had spread impiety throughout the land, and frustrated all the means used to retard its progress. The prophets of Judah 'pronounced their prophecies in the name of the true God, 'and entitled him to all their impostures; the wickedness 'of their lives also reflected a dishonour on his name and 'religion.' (Lowth.) 'They that should have profited 'by my rods against Samaria, are become worse than 'they.' (Marg. Ref.)

V. 16, 17. Make you vain. 'They deceive you, and 'soothe you into vain confidence.' To despise God, is not only most wicked in itself, but the grand aggravation of all other atrocious sins. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 18. This may be understood as the scoffing language of the false prophets, that opposed Jeremiah and others, who declared to them the Lord's counsel to destroy them and the city. They therefore derived their pretensions to inspiration: and inquired which of them was of the Lord's privy counsel, and made acquainted with his secret? And whether they alone had perceived and heard his word? They thought it not likely that two or three inconsiderable persons should know more concerning the will of God, than the numbers of respectable persons among the priests and prophets, who predicted peace and prosperity: and they were amazed at the confidence with which they uttered their prophecies. But on the other hand the words may be interpreted as spoken by Jeremiah, demanding of the false prophets, which of them had received any revelation from God, or indeed understood any thing of his word? 'The context shows, that he designs by this 'question to exclude only the carnal or natural man, from 'being enlightened from above, or being a competent 'judge of divine truths.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 19, 20. 'If these prophets had really known 'God's purposes and intentions, they would not have said "peace, peace,"—to the wicked; but have prophesied a 'grievous destruction just coming on them: for that is 'what will certainly come to pass; and the event will 'convince you of the truth of what I say. The sudden 'strokes of God's vengeance are often compared to a 'whirlwind.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

—In the latter, &c. The execution of the predicted judgments would effectually convince the people, that the prophet spake by authority from JEHOVAH. In those future days, the surviving captives, at Babylon, and they who lost their lives, in the eternal world would have leisure fully to consider the subject; and then they would reflect on their own incredulity and obstinacy, with bitter remorse and indignation at themselves for their folly and madness. But the latter days generally means the times of the Messiah, and even the latest ages of the world; and the full consideration and understanding of their present unparalleled dispersion after so many ages, and of the sins which provoked God thus to deal with their before highly favoured nation, will make way for the conversion of the Jews to Christ, and their restoration to their own land. (Note, xxx. 23, 24.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 21, 22. 'He showeth the difference between the 'true prophets and the false; between the hireling and 'the true minister.' The Lord here solemnly disowned these prophets, who at that time promised the people peace. They forwardly engaged in the work, and their predictions coincided with the corrupt inclinations of the people: they ran of their own accord, and prophesied out of their own heart, and all went on very smoothly. But if indeed they had stood in the Lord's counsel, and had spoken his words to the people: their grand object would have been to bring them to repentance, and to turn them from all their idolatries and iniquities to the worship of JEHOVAH. This would have been the tendency of their lives and doctrine; and they would have had some measure of success. But their object, and the tendency and effect of their prognostications, were entirely the reverse of this. —If it be inquired, how the people might know the false prophets from those that were sent of God, when these wrought no miracles, the obvious answer is this: the ministry of the true prophets was coincident with the law of Moses, and its precepts, promises, threatenings, and predictions, and to the writings of the preceding prophets; whereas the false prophets, in their predictions, ran counter to these sacred records. The instructions and example of the true prophets evidently tended to bring men to repentance, faith, serious godliness, and universal righteousness; those of the false prophets led them to rest in forms and notions, and to be quiet in their sins: and these are still the rules by which the faithful ministers of Christ are to be distinguished from false teachers. (Note, Matt. vii. 15—23.) 'Giving encouragement to men's carnal 'security is often mentioned as a mark of a false prophet.' (Lowth.) But in respect of their immediate revelations, the ministry of the true prophets admitted of another kind of proof. No miracles, or even predictions, verified by the event, could prove him a true prophet, whose doctrine evidently contradicted any of the leading truths and precepts of the preceding Scriptures; (Note, Deut. xiii. 3.) In other cases the accomplishment of such predictions as related to their own times, generally sanctioned those that referred to more remote events. This was the case especially with Jeremiah. (Notes, xxii.)

V. 23, 24. Did the false prophets think to hide their crimes from God? or teach the people that he could not pursue them with his vengeance into distant countries, and detect their most secret crimes? Did they suppose that he only knew what was doing in heaven, and was not present on the earth also, or in those corners that lay most remote from human observation? Could they hope to avoid his inspection, or escape his vengeance, whose presence fills heaven and earth?

V. 25—27. The false prophets pretended revelations from God in supernatural dreams; and they got it rumoured abroad. But the Lord knew this to be an imposture: for they only spake their own conjectures, the result of the pride and presumption of their own deceitful hearts. Their evident purpose was, to seduce the people into forgetfulness of God, and contempt of his word; that they might graft idolatry and superstition on their infidelity, and so render them their attached and submissive followers.— 'The giving heed to the false prophets is as effectual a way 'of making my people forget me and my laws, as the 'setting up an idolatrous way of worship, which hath 'been too successfully practised by their fathers.' (Lowth.)

V. 28, 29. Let then the matter be brought to decision between the different descriptions of prophets: let these dreamers declare openly their dreams, and let the true prophets faithfully deliver their message; and the difference would be as evident to the impartial inquirer, as that between the chaff and the wheat. The dreams of the false prophets would appear slight, superficial, and only calculated to flatter the pride and soothe the consciences of ungodly men: but the word of God, faithfully spoken by his servants, would appear weighty, interesting, suited to alarm the sinner's conscience, and to excite reverence of 30 Therefore, behold, [m] I am against the prophets, saith the LORD, that steal my words every one from his neighbour.

31 Behold, I am against the prophets, saith the LORD, that * use their tongues, and say, He saith.

32 Behold, I am against them that prophesy false dreams, saith the LORD, and do tell them, and cause my people [n] to err by their lies, [o] and by their † lightness; yet I sent them not, nor commanded them: [p] therefore they shall not profit this people at all, saith the LORD.

33 ¶ And when this people, or the prophet, or a priest, shall ask thee, saying, [q] What is the burden of the LORD? thou shalt then say unto them, What burden? [r] I will even forsake you, saith the LORD.

34 And as for the prophet, and the priest, and the people, that shall say, The burden of the LORD, I will even ‡ punish that man and his house.

35 Thus shall ye say [s] every one to his neighbour, and every one to his brother, What hath the LORD answered? and, What hath the LORD spoken?

36 And the burden of the LORD shall ye mention no more: for every man's word shall be his burden; [t] for ye have perverted the words of the living God, of the LORD of hosts our God.

37 Thus shalt thou say to the prophet, What hath the LORD answered thee? and, What hath the LORD spoken?

38 But since ye say, The burden of the LORD; therefore thus saith the LORD; Because ye say this word, the burden of the LORD, and I have sent unto you, saying, Ye shall not say, The burden of the LORD;

39 Therefore, behold, [u] I, even I, will utterly forget you, and I will forsake you, and the city that I gave you and your fathers, and [x] cast you out of my presence:

God's authority, and conducive to repentance and holiness. For "is not the word of God like fire?" This element penetrates, enlivens, illuminates, softens, melts, purifies, consumes, or transforms, every substance into its own nature. Thus the sacred word penetrates the conscience, quickens and illuminates the mind, softens and melts the heart, purifies the affections, consumes the dross of sin, and transforms the believer's soul into its own holy nature. As a hammer, also, it breaks down the presumptuous confidence of the proud and stout-hearted, and renders them broken and contrite in spirit; and it crushes the rebellion and obstinacy of the will, and produces humble submission and obedience. This is the genuine tendency of the uncorrupted word of God, and these effects are produced where it is truly believed: but false doctrine is coincident with the pride and lusts of the human heart; and the more firmly it is believed, the faster are the chains of sin riveted, and the more is conscience stupified in impenitence, and the will in obstinate rebellion.

V. 30. The false prophets catched up some of the phrases of the true prophets, and such things as suited their purpose: and this served to give plausibility to the lying predictions which they intermingled with them.

V. 32. The word rendered lightness, is understood by some to mean inconstancy, a frivolous accommodation to the varying humours of the people; by others flattery; and by others boasting, namely, of their revelations. (Num. xxiv. 3, 4. 2 Pet. ii. 15—19. Jude 16.)

V. 33—40. (Note, Isaiah xiii. 1.) The prophets frequently called their prophecies "Burdens," especially when they related to divine judgments: and their opposers ridiculed the expression. So that, by way of exposing them for delivering so many terrible predictions, they used deridingly to ask, "What is the burden of the LORD?" To this Jeremiah was commanded to answer, that "the "LORD would forsake them," and then their miseries would indeed be a heavy burden. He did not mean, that God would finally forsake the nation, but that he would forsake those mockers, and that rebellious generation. And if any of them dared to use that expression in derision any more, the Lord declared that he would severely punish that man and his house. He therefore directed them what words to use in such cases, that they might not ridicule the language of the Holy Spirit. But as they would pervert his words, who was "the living God, the "LORD of Hosts, their God;" he would make their own words fall on them as a heavy burden, and execute the predicted judgments with unrelenting severity. As we find some of the succeeding prophets used the same expression, it is plain that God did not mean to restrict his servants from using, but his enemies from deriding, this word, (Zech. ix. 1.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—8.

Every man must render an account to God of the talents committed to his stewardship; and "to whom much hath "been given, of him will much be required." Men must also be answerable to God for the mischief that arises from their neglect of duty, as well as for their other crimes. Wo then be to those rulers, who abuse their authority to destroy and scatter their subjects! who oppress and plunder those whom they are commissioned to protect! Or who suffer them to be enslaved, oppressed, slaughtered, or scattered by private depredators, or foreign enemies, through their ambition, avarice, luxury, or negligence! But still deeper guilt is contracted by the pastors of God's flock, the professed rulers and teachers of the Church, who abuse their authority, neglect their work, are greedy of filthy lucre, and persecute those whom they ought to tend and feed. The true sheep of Christ, however, shall not be lost, through the negligence or wickedness of such pastors. Their great and good Shepherd, who is the LORD of Hosts, will gather them from every district of the earth into his fold; and there he will place over them able, faithful, diligent, and tender shepherds, to feed and tend them: and he himself will protect them by his power, and support them by his grace from terror and dismay; and not one of them shall be wanting, when he shall come finally to separate betwixt the sheep and the goats. For this righteous Branch hath been raised up unto David, and now reigns as Immanuel on the mediatorial throne; to execute judgment on his enemies, and to save and defend his people: and in him, as "The Lord our Right-"eousness," believers are "justified, and glory;" of his Spirit they all partake, and are taught to love, to obey, and imitate him, in whom is all their salvation. "To him shall the gathering of the people be:" his redemption is far more glorious than all former deliverances of his Church: here the glory of God is peculiarly displayed, and it is our grand privilege to have such a Prophet, Priest, and King: may our souls be gathered to him, and found in him; and may Jews and Gentiles, and all the inhabitants of the earth, become the subjects of "The LORD our righteousness!"

V. 9—32.

Whilst we rejoice in our privileges, if we be zealous for the glory of God, and have compassion for our fellow-sinners, we cannot but be deeply concerned, when we consider the present state of mankind, and even that of the visible Church. It might well fill us with consternation and amazement, and prompt us to such earnestness in endeavouring to convince men of their guilt and misery, as would be despised by carnal men, and mistaken for inebriation or insanity, (Notes, Acts ii. 13—15. 2 Cor. v. 10—14.) to compare the words of God's holiness in the sacred Scriptures, with the doctrine of most teachers, and the lives of most professed Christians. For it is evident that they are wretchedly deceived, and deceiving each other into a false peace, when the heavy wrath of God is ready to fall upon them. Whilst even in this favoured land men seem ambitious to exceed the adulteries and lewdness of the reprobate Jews, there can be no doubt but a far heavier load of perjury rests upon us; which, being connected with the system of political government and judicial transactions, and even ecclesiastical affairs, is in the strictest sense a national sin. "Because of swear-"ing" our land ought to mourn in deep repentance: and if it do not, it may justly be apprehended, that ere long it will mourn under desolating judgments, which may turn all our pleasant places into a wilderness. But, alas! the course in which men in general proceed is evil; and too often authority and influence give energy to natural depravity, to urge them on more forcibly in sin. And are not many of our priests and prophets ungodly? Does not the Lord find their wickedness in his house, and even at his table? And do not numbers thus provoke God to give them up to the lusts of their own hearts, till they are driven headlong into destruction? Perhaps God more abhors those who profess to preach his truth, but pervert it by their lies, and disgrace it by their vices, than those who openly abet the cause of infidelity and irreligion. He sees it very horrible when the wicked examples of the teachers combine with their soothing and plausible instructions to embolden evil doers in their crimes, and to quiet the consciences of the impenitent and unbelieving: and though men may attempt to palliate these abominations, they are in the eyes of the Lord as vile as the inhabitants of Sodom, and it will be less tolerable for them in the day of judgment. For from such teachers, profaneness goes forth throughout the land: the principles and morals of the people are poisoned at the fountain-head; and hence originate those torrents of infidelity, impiety, and profligacy, which overwhelm whole nations, and ripen them for destruction. Yet they that will hearken to such teachers as speak from their own hearts, and not out of the mouth of the Lord, and whose doctrine tends to render them vain and ungodly, must be answerable for it: for it is easy to distinguish them from those who stand in the counsel of the Lord, and hear his word; especially as he hath promised to give wisdom to them who lack it, and pray for it. It is plain that many run before they are sent of God; and that they only aim to obtain preferment or reputation, and not to bring sinners to repentance, to faith in Christ, and newness of life: and therefore they scruple not to promise peace to those who despise the Lord, and who walk after the imagination of their own hearts. It is evident that this is the tendency and effect of much public teaching: men, destitute of the fear of God, and without conscientiousness in their general conduct, are emboldened by it to hope well of their state, and even to deem themselves interested in all the privileges of the gospel. Some of these teachers dream dreams of the deceit of their own hearts, and are continually inventing new refinements in infidelity or enthusiasm, which cause the people to forget the Lord, and his holy truths and precepts; to take a part of the Bible for the whole; to establish new creeds, or to separate doctrinal truths from their practical tendency. Some again retail other men's inventions, and steal scraps of divinity from their neighbours, and preach, (without any judgment of their own,) what other men have compiled for them; to indulge their laziness, and to gratify their own avarice. Others pick up a few notions and expressions from faithful ministers; and by additions, alterations, or perversions, enervate and corrupt them, and cause the people to err by their lies and lightness. But what is all this chaff to the wheat? saith the Lord. Cannot they be distinguished from each other? Let the word of God be faithfully and fully preached, and the difference will soon appear, in its nature, tendency, and effects: for the word of God is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two edged sword; it comes to the heart and conscience with authority and conviction; it tends to instruct and alarm, to break the hard, and to humble the proud heart: it leads to repentance, to faith, and holiness: it enlightens, quickens, purifies, and renews the soul: it is no smooth, lulling, stupifying message; but resembles the fire and the hammer that breaketh the rocks in pieces. And by these emblems, this tendency, and these effects, and by the spirit and example of true ministers of Christ, the real word of God may be distinguished as certainly from false doctrines, taught by carnal preachers, as the wheat may be known from the worthless chaff. No fair appearances or pretences can conceal the hypocrisy, ambition, avarice, or infidelity of false professors or teachers from the omnipresent heart-searching Judge. He hears all their words, and sees their thoughts; he will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and manifest the counsels of their hearts: and when his vengeance shall fall grievously upon the head of the wicked, and he hath performed the thoughts of his heart respecting them, they will perfectly consider, and effectually be convinced of those truths, which before they would not believe.

V. 33—40.

It is a mark of great and daring impiety for men to jest with the words of God, or to ridicule the expressive language of faithful ministers. The enmity of the carnal heart works greatly in thus perverting the words of the living God: they who expect impunity in sin, and despise or abuse the salvation of the Gospel, are always prone to revile or deride those who, in the most scriptural manner, preach to sinners their danger of eternal damnation: and numbers only inquire concerning the word of God for their diversion, or to ridicule it. But every idle and profane word will add to the sinner's insupportable burden of wrath and misery, in the day when the Judge shall bid him "depart accursed into everlasting fire, prepared for the "devil and his angels;" and when, being forsaken of God, everlasting shame and reproach will be his portion. Let us then so inquire after the word of the Lord, that we may believe, reverence, and obey it, for our good.

The afflictions of the captives were suited to humble and lead them to repentance; whilst those who remained at Jerusalem became more and more hardened in presumption and rebellion. But whatever means were used, the power of divine grace effected the grand difference betwixt them. The Lord promised to give the captives a heart, (a proper disposition of mind,) to know him, in the glory of his perfections, and in his relations unto them: and this knowledge would induce them to renounce all idols and iniquities, and to return to his worship and service with their whole heart. A review of the messages sent by Jeremiah to the Jews during twenty-three years; and their contempt of them reproved, 1—7. A prediction of the desolations of the land for seventy years; after which the Chaldean empire would be subverted, 8—14. acknowledged as his people, and he would be their God, their Portion, Protector, and Salvation: and he would take care of them as a man would of the best and most valued produce of the fig-tree. Doubtless a great reformation and revival of religion took place among the captives, and by them and their descendants the land was afterwards chiefly replenished: for they who remained in Judea, were in general destroyed, or driven into Egypt, whence few, if any of them returned; or they were carried to distant regions, and detained in slavery. But some expressions lead us to suppose, that the Spirit of prophecy looked forward to the present dispersion of the unbelieving Jews in all the nations of the earth, and all the debasing circumstances attending it. 'To the first captives chiefly those 'blessings belong, which are promised to the Jews upon 'their return from captivity; such as were the knowledge 'and fear of God, and grace to live in obedience to his 'commandments. But I conceive the eminent comple-'tion of this prophecy will be at the time of the general 'restoration of that nation.' (Lowth.)
V. 8—10. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The professors of true religion are presented before God, to be devoted to his glory, and employed in doing good to mankind; as the first fruits of the fig-tree were brought to the temple, to be used by the priests and Levites. Indeed, none of the human race are so good and useful as true believers; but none are so vile and worthless as hypocrites: thus the good are very good, and the bad very bad, more than among other men. (Matt. v. 13.) But the Lord often spares those longest, and exempts them most from present suffering, whom he hath appointed unto wrath. As many as he loves he rebukes and chastens: and when the loss of estates, liberty, and country, and a complication of hardships and calamities, are sanctified to the saving of their souls, these appear to be the methods by which God acknowledges his choice of them, and his purpose of doing them good. He alone can remove the pride, enmity, and blindness of the carnal mind, and give men hearts to know, fear, love, and trust in him: when this change takes place, they cordially return to him in his appointed way. Thus they become his accepted obedient servants and worshippers; and he becomes their God and Father. Thenceforth he will comfort them under all their trials, deliver them from every enemy, and set his eyes upon them for good, and that for ever. Let those who desire these blessings beg of God to give them a heart to know him. And let us remember, that it is in this way that the Lord preserves a Church on earth; whilst multitudes of professed Christians, without respect of rank or external distinction, are given up to complicated contempt and misery, for a warning to others not to copy their crimes, nor to presume upon their privileges: and this consideration should direct our prayers, and encourage our hopes, respecting a final prevalence of the Gospel throughout the earth.

Two years Nebuchadnezzar reigned with 'his father. Daniel, writing in Chaldea, follows the 'computation in use among the Chaldeans.' (Lowth.) This fixes the beginning of Nebuchadnezzar's reign two years later; namely, from the time in which he began to reign alone. (Note, Dan. ii. 1.)

V. 3. (Note, i. 2.) Doubtless Jeremiah preached much more than was committed to writing, and laboured constantly among the Jews, according to the tenour of those messages which were recorded: and it is probable that several prophets wrote nothing, whose names are not transmitted to us.

Rising early. 'That is, I spared no diligence or labour.' (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4. Zephaniah, Urijah the son of Shemaiah, (xxvi. 20, 21.) and Huldah the prophetess, lived about this time: and it is probable that Habakkuk was contemporary with them. (Notes, vii. 13. Is. v. 4.)

V. 6. If the people had repented and returned to the Lord, he would not have hurt them; for all his denunciations of vengeance implied a reserve of mercy to the penitent; and his service would have been very profitable: so that nothing could hurt them but their own evil works. This was the purport of Jeremiah's ministry, and that of all the other prophets.

V. 9. Nebuchadrezzar did not mean to serve God, but to gratify his own ambition by his conquests; but the Lord intended to employ him as the executioner of his righteous vengeance: and he gave notice of it, as soon as Nebuchadrezzar came to the throne, to make it generally known that his future success and greatness were a part of the plan of JEHOVAH.

Nations. 'Some of these, particularly Egypt, were 'the Jews' confederates, on whose assistance they relied: 'and the subduing of them made way for the easier con-'quest of Judah.' (Lowth.)

V. 10. (Marg. Ref.) 'St. John exactly follows the 'Hebrew text; (Rev. xviii. 22, 23.) whereas the seventy 'in this place, instead of "the sound of the mill-stones," 'read, "the smell of ointment;" from which, and several 'other places of the New Testament, it appears that the 'apostles and evangelists did not implicitly follow the 'Greek translation; but only when they thought it agree-'able to the original text.' (Lowth.)

V. 11. Seventy, &c. (Notes, 2 Chr. xxxvi. 21. Ezra i. 1. vi. 6—15. Dan. ix. 1. 3. Zech. i. 12, 13.)

V. 12. 'God often punishes the persons whom he 'makes instruments of his vengeance on others, for those 'very things which they did by his appointment: because 'their intent was purely to carry on their own ambitious 'and cruel purposes, and not at all to fulfil God's will or 'advance his glory. So that the evil they did was alto-'gether their own, and the good that was produced out of 'it was to be ascribed to God.' (Lowth.)

V. 13. The prophecies, contained in the fiftieth and fifty-first chapters against Babylon, seem here referred to; and this renders it probable that they had been delivered before this time; though the order, in which they now stand, may lead the reader to suppose the contrary.

16 And they shall drink, and [a] be moved, and be mad, because of the sword that I will send among them.

17 Then took I the cup at the LORD's hand, [b] and made all the nations to drink, unto whom the LORD had sent me;

18 To wit, [c] Jerusalem, and the cities of Judah, and the kings thereof, and the princes thereof, [d] to make them a desolation, an astonishment, an hissing, and a curse; [e] as it is this day;

V. 14—'The nations and kings, which confederated 'with Cyrus.'

V. 15—17. The nature of the case determines this to have been a figurative representation, and not a real transaction; for the prophet could not have performed literally the things here commanded: but this was not the case in respect of some other transactions, which many suppose to have only been done in vision. (Note, xiii. 1—11.) It was in this way revealed to the prophet, and he was ordered to publish it as widely as he could, that the vengeance of God would be executed on all the surrounding nations, as well as on the Jews, by Nebuchadrezzar and his Chaldeans. The wrath of God, and its fatal effects, when men are judicially left to infatuation and rage, and to rush upon their own destruction, are aptly represented by a cup of intoxicating liquor, mingled with poisonous ingredients; such as was commonly given to condemned criminals, in order to end their wretched lives.

V. 18. As it is this day. 'This relates to the desola-'tions of Judea and Jerusalem, when all that had been 'foretold by Jeremiah was fulfilled; and therefore must 'have been added by Baruch, or by Ezra, or whoever it 'was that collected Jeremiah's prophecies into one volume.' (Lowth.) As the prophet lived to witness the completion of these predictions, it is not at all unlikely, that he himself added the clause to the copies that were afterwards written; from which it might be inserted also in the others.

V. 20. The mingled, &c. These are supposed to have been the various tribes of the Midianites, and others connected with them: though some think that the several nations, dwelling on the Mediterranean sea, are intended. (Marg. Ref.) 'The kings mentioned here, and in the 'following verses, were petty princes of several clans and 'colonies. The title of king is given in Scripture to any 'ruler or governor.' (Lowth.)

V. 22. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 23. (Marg. Ref. Note, ix. 26.) Little satisfactory information can be adduced, about several of the tribes or nations mentioned in this passage, beyond what may be collected by consulting the marginal references.

V. 24. Mingled. 'The learned Dr. Pocock is of 'opinion, that the word Arabia is derived from the He-'brew word Arab, signifying mixture. Because the 'country was inhabited by a medley of several nations.' (Lowth.)

V. 25. Zimri. 'A people of Arabia, descended from 'Zimran, Abraham's son by Keturah.' (Lowth.)

V. 26. The world. 'The kingdoms within the extent 'of the Babylonish empire, which called itself Empress of 'the world. So oikoumene, (all the world,) is put for 'the Roman empire.' (Luke ii. 1.) (Lowth.) (Dan. ii. 38. iv. 22. v. 19.) Some render the clause, "All the "kingdoms of every region which lies before this land," that is, the countries all round about Chaldea. Sheshach evidently means Babylon; though it is not certain on what account it was so called. When the kings of Babylon had executed the predicted vengeance on these nations, they would in their turn be punished for their still more enormous wickedness. (Marg. Ref.)

28 And it shall be, if they refuse to take the cup at thine hand to drink, then shalt thou say unto them, Thus saith the LORD of hosts; [e] Ye shall certainly drink.

29 For, lo, [f] I begin to bring evil on the city * which is called by my name, and should ye be utterly unpunished? ye shall not be unpunished: for [g] I will call for a sword upon all the inhabitants of the earth, saith the LORD of hosts.

30 Therefore prophesy thou against them all these words, and say unto them, The LORD shall [h] roar from on high, and utter his voice from [i] his holy habitation; he shall mightily roar upon his habitation; he shall give [k] a shout, as they that tread the grapes, against all the inhabitants of the earth.

31 A noise shall come even to the ends of the earth; for [l] the LORD hath a controversy with the nations, he will [m] plead with all flesh: he will give them that are wicked to the sword, saith the LORD

32 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, Behold, [n] evil shall go forth from nation to nation, and a great whirlwind shall be raised up from the coasts of the earth.

33 And [o] the slain of the LORD shall be at that day from one end of the earth even unto the other end of the earth: [p] they shall not be lamented, neither gathered, nor buried; they shall be dung upon the ground

V. 29. If the Governor of the world would not let his own worshippers escape punishment, but would even destroy the city and temple, which were more immediately dedicated to him, for the sins of the people, would he deal with idolaters and avowed enemies as if they were altogether innocent? Or would he suffer them to escape with impunity? (Marg. Ref.)

V. 30. Upon, &c. The Lord would utter and execute his tremendous threatenings from his holy habitation in heaven, upon Jerusalem and the temple, which had been as his habitation on earth; but which, having been polluted with wickedness, were sentenced to be destroyed along with the cities of the Gentiles. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 31—33. The dreadful devastations made by the Chaldeans through all the nations in that part of the world, and at length the destruction of Babylon by the Medes and Persians, are primarily foretold, in this awful language: but it accords very much with those passages in which the ruin of all the antichristian powers is evidently predicted. (Marg. Ref.) (Notes, Is. xxxiv. Ez. xxxviii. xxxix. Rev. xviii. xix.)

V. 34—36. When the predicted judgments of God should dismay and scatter the nations, as the roaring of a lion would a flock of sheep, the shepherds or rulers would have peculiar cause to howl: they would have no place to flee to, the pasture whence their wealth arose would be spoiled, and they would fall a prey to the instruments of the Lord's indignation.

Pleasant vessel. 'As an earthen vessel that is curiously 'wrought, while it holds sound is well esteemed; but if 'once it fall and break, is worth nothing: so shall ye be 'unto me.' (Bp Hall.) The rulers of the Jews seem principally meant. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 37. 'In the Hebrew it is neoth Shalem, alluding to 'Salem, the same with Jerusalem.' (Lowth.) (Heb. vii. 2.)

V. 38. Some expositors understand this of Nebuchadrezzar, who had left the covert of Babylon, to destroy the nations, especially Judah. (iv. 7.) Others explain it of the Lord, who had left Jerusalem and his temple defenceless to their enraged invaders and oppressors: whereas, had he continued to protect them, no enemy would have dared to approach, any more than other beasts would enter the den of a fierce lion, whilst he remained in it.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—14.

The command to repent and turn from every evil way to the worship and service of God; and the invitations to sinners to come and trust in Christ, and partake of his salvation; concern all men, and ought to be fully and plainly proposed to all. It is agreed by the servants of the Lord, in every age and under every dispensation, that he

CHAP. XXVI.

Jeremiah, delivering an awful message at the temple, is persecuted by the priests and prophets, 1—9. He pleads his cause before the princes, exhorts them to repent, and warns them not to shed innocent blood, 10—15. The princes acquit him, referring to the example of Micah, 16—19. Urijah, prophesying in like manner, is persecuted; and fleeing into Egypt, is fetched thence by Jehoiakim and slain, 20—23. Ahikam protects Jeremiah, 24.

IN [a] the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah, came this word from the LORD, saying,

2 Thus saith the LORD; [b] Stand in the court of the LORD's house, and speak unto all the cities of Judah, which come to worship in the LORD's house, [c] all the words that I command thee to speak unto them; [d] diminish not a word:

[b] vii 2. xix. 14. xxxvi. 10. 2 Chr. xxiv 20, 21. Luke xix. 47, 48. xx. 1 xxi 37, 38 John viii. 2. Acts v. 20, 21. 25 42 will do no hurt to those, however vile they have been, who truly obey this command, and accede to this invitation: and that no good can come to those who provoke him by impenitent wickedness; that no profession, or creed, or forms, can profit those who are not turned from the evil of their doings. He keeps an exact register of our sins and the aggravations of them, and of our abused mercies and means of grace; and thus the continued neglect of the warnings of his faithful ministers exceedingly hastens the execution of his judgments. The earnestness with which the servants of God labour, and the fervency with which they pray for the salvation of souls, afford a striking contrast to the supineness and negligence of most men about their own salvation! Our God is sincere in all his invitations, and faithful to all his promises; he rejoiceth in mercy, and delighteth not in the death of the wicked. How soon will they, who refuse to seek happiness in his favour, be deprived of every source of transient joy! All miseries on earth, however, are temporal, and have an appointed period; but the wrath to come is perpetual, yea, eternal. The Lord employs wicked men as his servants, and when they have executed his vengeance on others, to gratify their own vile passions, he punishes them for their wickedness. And every threatening of Scripture will be as certainly accomplished, as those have been that relate to Babylon and Jerusalem.

V. 15—33.

How grand and awful a view have we, in this passage, given us of divine providence! How affecting, of the state of fallen man! The judgments of God have ever been going their rounds from one nation to another, and have never been suffered to rest; because of the wickedness of mankind! When we consider the fury and rage, with which the nations of the earth have, in every age, rushed upon mutual carnage and destruction; we must allow, that their conduct hath resembled that of men who are intoxicated and mad: but we need not wonder at these effects, when we reflect that they have been drinking of the cup of God's indignation, and have been given up to their own mad passions, to execute his vengeance on each other. This emblem also may instruct us what an odious and pernicious vice drunkenness is; and how dreadful the wrath of God must be to those who fall under it to rise no more. It is vain to struggle against the sentence which he hath denounced, or to object to his righteousness: he will constrain men to drink of this bitter cup; he will destroy them with his avenging sword. He will not even spare those cities or persons who have been called by his name; but if his judgments begin with degenerate professors of Christianity, let not the impious and profligate expect to be altogether unpunished. From his holy habitation he will utter his voice against all flesh. He hath just ground of controversy with every nation and every individual, and he will plead against them, and execute judgment on all the wicked. Thus evil goes from nation to nation: no tongue can express the miseries that have been endured, or the multitudes that have perished, by the great scourges of the world, who successively have been raised up, run their course, and been destroyed. We have abundant cause to be thankful, that ours are yet peaceable habitations: but many, which were so for a time, have been cut down, because of the fierce anger of the Lord. When he leaves his place to execute judgment, or withdraws his protection from offending nations, the days of slaughter arrive, and lands are soon left desolate, or groaning under the iron rod of oppression: and then the chief in rank and authority are most exposed to peril and suffering, and are generally the least able to escape, or to endure hardship. But the Lord will preserve his people in all changes: and whatever removes them from this world of sin and sorrow, they will then enter into those peaceful mansions, where war, changes, sickness, and death, can find no admission; because no sin will be found therein for ever.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVI. V. 2. 'The great court was the 'place where both men and women did ordinarily worship, 'when they brought no sacrifice: for when they brought 'sacrifice, they were to bring it into the inner court,—or 'that of the priests.' (Lightfoot.) This prophecy being delivered in the courts of the temple, on a public occasion, before the priests and false prophets as well as the people, was likely to exasperate the minds of the hardened offenders, especially of those in authority and reputation: and therefore the prophet was expressly commanded not to diminish a word from it: as he might have been tempted to do, especially as Urijah had been put to death for his faithfulness, probably just before.

Diminish. 'Either out of fear, favour, or flattery.' (Lowth.)

3 If [e] so be they will hearken, and turn every man from his evil way, that I may repent me of the evil, which I purpose to do unto them, because of the evil of their doings.

4 And thou shalt say unto them, Thus saith the LORD, [f] If ye will not hearken to me, to walk in my law, which I have set before you,

5 To hearken to the words of [g] my servants the prophets, whom I sent unto you, both rising up early, and sending them, but ye have not hearkened;

6 Then [h] will I make this house like Shiloh, and will make this city [i] a curse to all the nations of the earth.

7 So [k] the priests, and the prophets, and all the people, heard Jeremiah speaking these words in the house of the LORD.

8 Now it came to pass, when Jeremiah had made an end of speaking all that the LORD had commanded him to speak unto all the people, that [l] the priests and the prophets, and all the people, took him, saying, Thou shalt surely die.

9 [m] Why hast thou prophesied in the name of the LORD, saying, This house shall be like Shiloh, and this city shall be desolate without an inhabitant? [n] And all the people were gathered against Jeremiah [o] in the house of the LORD.

10 ¶ When [p] the priests of Judah heard these things, then they came up from the king's house unto the house of the LORD, and sat down * in the entry of [q] the new gate of the LORD's house.

11 Then spake the priests and the prophets unto the princes and to all the people, [r] saying, † This man is worthy to die: [s] for he hath prophesied against this city, as ye have heard with your ears.

12 Then spake Jeremiah unto all the princes, and to all the people, saying, [t] The LORD sent me to prophesy against this house, and against this city, all the words that ye have heard.

13 Therefore now [u] amend your ways and your doings, and obey the voice of the LORD your God; and the LORD will [x] repent him of the evil that he hath pronounced against you.

14 As for me, behold, [y] I am in your hand: do with me ‡ as seemeth good and meet unto you:

15 But know ye for certain, that if ye put me to death, [z] ye shall surely bring innocent blood upon yourselves, and upon this city, and upon the inhabitants thereof: [a] for of a truth the LORD hath sent me unto you, to speak all these words in your ears.

16 Then said [b] the princes, and all

V. 8. Die. 'As a disturber of the government, and a 'discourager of the people from defending their country.' (Lowth.)

V. 9. Why, &c. The priests and false prophets, who were the prosecutors of Jeremiah, seem to have utterly disregarded what he had spoken concerning repentance and turning from their evil ways; and merely to have noticed the prophecy against the city and temple, in case they did not repent, as if it had been absolute; and thus they in effect bare false witness against him. They doubtless professed to be zealous for the temple and their religious establishment; while they chiefly regarded their own reputation, authority, and emoluments. But though they were hypocrites in religion, and profligate in their morals; yet, (like the Scribes and Pharisees in the time of Christ,) they had acquired such ascendency over the minds of the people, that they were ready to leave their devotions to join with them in putting the prophet to death, for saying no more than Moses in the law, and all the preceding prophets, had said before him!

V. 10. New gate. 'So called because it had been 'repaired by Jotham.' (2 Kings xv. 35.)

V. 11. Worthy, &c. "The sentence of death against "this man;" 'we require that sentence be pronounced 'and executed.' This greatly resembled the conduct of the scribes, priests, and elders, who demanded of Pilate that Jesus should be put to death: and the charge brought against Jeremiah was exactly the same as that brought against the first martyr, St. Stephen.

V. 12—15. The calm intrepidity, the disinterested faithfulness, and the meekness of wisdom, manifested in the prophet's answer, in such trying circumstances, are peculiarly admirable. Conscious that he had spoken nothing but what God had commanded him to speak; he seems to have been very little solicitous concerning the event as to himself: but his disinterested love to his ungrateful people, united with fervent zeal for the honour of God, in leading him to seize the opportunity of once more, in the most solemn and pathetic manner, exhorting them to repentance, and of warning them not to add to all their other personal and national transgressions, the guilt of innocent blood, with this peculiar aggravation, that it would be the blood of a prophet, shed for faithfully obeying the command of God. (Marg. Ref.) the people unto the priests, and to the prophets, This man is not worthy to die: for he hath spoken to us in the name of the LORD our God.

17 Then rose up certain of the elders of the land, and spake to all the assembly of the people, saying,

18 [c] Micah the Morasthite prophesied in the days of Hezekiah king of Judah, and spake to all the people of Judah, saying, Thus saith the LORD of hosts; [d] Zion shall be plowed like a field, and [e] Jerusalem shall become heaps, and [f] the mountain of the house as the high places of the forest.

19 Did Hezekiah king of Judah, and all Judah put him at all to death? [g] did he not fear the LORD, and besought * the LORD, and [h] the LORD repented him of the evil which he had pronounced against them? [i] Thus might we procure great evil against our souls.

20 And there was also a man that prophesied in the name of the LORD, Urijah, the son of Shemaiah of [k] Kirjath-jearim, who prophesied against this city, and against this land, according to all the words of Jeremiah:

21 And when Jehoiakim the king, with all his mighty men, and all the princes, heard his words, [l] the king sought to put him to death: but when Urijah heard it, [m] he was afraid, and fled, and went into Egypt;

22 And Jehoiakim the king sent [n] men into Egypt, namely, Elnathan the son of [o] Achbor, and certain men with him into Egypt.

23 And they fetched forth Urijah out of Egypt, and brought him unto Jehoiakim the king; [p] who slew him with the sword, and cast his dead body into the graves of the † common people.

24 ¶ Nevertheless the hand of [q] Ahikam the son of Shaphan was with Jeremiah, [r] that they should not give him into the hand of the people to put him to death.

V. 16—19. Some expositors consider the remainder of this chapter as the debate which took place in the Sanhedrim, or council, on the case of Jeremiah: but as the people were present, part of the time at least, and as no mention is made of the council, but merely of the princes and certain elders, perhaps what is here recorded took place in the court of the temple; and the subsequent verses were added by the prophet, to illustrate the narrative.—'The people, who before were forward to condemn him; 'now, upon hearing his apology, were as ready to acquit 'him.' (Lowth.) They before united with the priests and prophets; but now some of them concurred with the princes, who refused to pronounce the sentence of death against Jeremiah, (24.) "Not against this man the sen-"tence of death." (Note, 11.) It does not appear, whether "the elders of the land" were some of the princes before mentioned; or other eminent persons, who adduced before appositely the example of Micah, and quoted his words in support of their determination, and against the rash judgment of priests and prophets. (Note, Mic. iv. 12.) There is no satisfactory ground in the following history, to conclude that either these princes, or elders in general, so attended to the message of God, as to repent of their sins, or to attempt a public reformation; though they seem at this time to have had transient convictions, which the Lord made use of for his servant's preservation. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 20—23. 'This seems to be an instance alleged by 'others of the Sanhedrim, in favour of the priests and pro-'phets who were for condemning Jeremiah.' (Lowth.) If the narrative was added by the sacred writer, he meant to magnify the power and goodness of God in preserving him against the persecuting violence of Jehoiakim, as well as that of the priests and prophets. Urijah seems to have been very faithful in delivering his message, but faulty in relinquishing his work, and fleeing into Egypt for fear of Jehoiakim; as if he dared not to stand to what he had said. Jehoiakim, by burying Urijah "in the graves of the com-"mon people," intended to render him and his prediction contemptible among his subjects. Had the king and people imitated Hezekiah, the Lord would have averted the threatened judgments, as he had done in that pious prince's time: nor would Nebuchadnezzar have been able to take the city, any more than Sennacherib had been. But God foresaw, that both rulers and people would bring destruction on themselves by impenitence, and by murdering his prophets.

V. 24. 'Which declareth that nothing could have 'appeased their fury, if God had not moved this noble-'man to stand valiantly in his defence.' Both Shaphan and Ahikam were employed by Josiah in his reformation, and were his principal ministers; and several of Ahikam's brethren or near relations seem to have been principal persons during the reign of Jehoiakim and his successors; so that his influence must have been very great. His son Gedaliah was appointed ruler over the remnant of Jews, left in the land by Nebuchadnezzar after the destruction of Jerusalem; and he appears to have been a man of good character. So that it is not improbable that Ahikam was a pious man; though, except on this occasion, he did not boldly espouse the cause of the prophet. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—9.

The ambassadors of God should speak his word with all boldness, and adhere strictly to their instructions: but in so

CHAP. XXVII.

Jeremiah is directed to make yokes and bonds; to wear one on his own neck, and to send them to several kings by their ambassadors, with a command from the Creator of the world to submit to the king of Babylon, if they would escape destruction, 1—11. He counsels Zedekiah to the same effect; warns him and the people against false prophets; and predicts further desolations, 12—22.

IN the beginning of the reign of [a] Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah, came this word unto Jeremiah from the LORD, saying, [a] 13 12 19, 20. xxviii. 1.

doing they will often be exposed to danger, and to the censure even of their more timid and less zealous friends. A minister of religion, who diminishes aught from the message which he is sent to deliver, is as justly chargeable with unfaithfulness, as he who alters any thing in it; we should therefore be very diligent in obtaining an acquaintance with the whole revealed counsel of God, as well as careful to declare it without respect of persons. It must not be expected, that the Lord will abate any thing of what he requires, or make any alteration in his method of delivering sinners from deserved punishment. It is his invariable rule to pour contempt on all external distinctions and performances, when men rest in them, and neglect the power of godliness: and indeed the most implacable enemies to true religion have often been most zealous for forms and notions; especially when their interests and characters were concerned. It hath therefore sometimes been safer to denounce the judgments of God against wicked princes, and even in the palaces of kings, (Notes xxii.) than in the precincts of the temple, and before hypocritical priests and prophets; who have in every age been ready to inquire of those, whom the Lord has employed as his messengers, by whose authority they did such things; and to pronounce them worthy to die for doing his will! They have also frequently seduced the people into such an unaccountable reverence for them, that they have been ready to concur in their persecuting designs, without further inquiry!

It is evidently desirable, that, in every nation, the power of decision in all criminal causes should finally be vested in the civil government: for even where princes are irreligious, they are not influenced by so many personal motives or resentments, as profligate ecclesiastics are; and more justice may be expected even from a Pilate than from a Caiaphas. But how shameful is it, when they who bear the sacred character, stand forward to persecute the servants of God, and wrest their words in testifying against them! and when, after all, the magistrates show that they have done no evil; nay, justify their conduct from the examples and precepts of Scripture! It behooves those who are most earnest in the cause of God, to be proportionably calm and resigned in their own concerns; it suffices to show that they act in obedience to him and confide in his protection; and it is very proper that they should express more regard for the good of their persecutors, than for their own personal safety; taking the opportunity of meekly warning them not to add the guilt of murder or oppression to their other sins, but to amend their lives, that it may be well with them: as all men may know for certain, that injuring or putting to death their faithful reprovers will hasten and increase the punishments of individuals and communities. The more pious any man is, the less apt will he be to resent the most pointed Scriptural reproofs and warnings: for such persons profit continually by this plain dealing, and are led to fear God, and seek his favour with increasing earnestness; and thus they escape the threatened condemnation. Of what great importance is it to be well versed in the Scripture history: for apposite references may be made to it on almost every occasion, and directions deduced from it, to regulate our conduct! It seems a light matter to conclude, that they are not worthy to be put to death, who have spoken the word of the Lord: yet they may generally think themselves greatly favoured, who are thus protected, though they have no other recompense from man. For many whose consciences testify to the character of the faithful minister, and to the truth of his words, and who will occasionally countenance him, from conviction or personal respect, will not obey the commands of God delivered by him, but go on in sin to their own destruction. No enmity is more implacable, than that excited by faithful reproof; or more dangerous, when the proud transgressor hath power to gratify it: but none can go further than the Lord is pleased to permit; and they who are employed in his service, and abide in their proper work and place, have no reason to fear man. Extraordinary cases call for extraordinary firmness: but though the servants of God agree in the substance of their ministry, they do not all possess equal constancy and intrepidity; nor do the same persons at all times. The persecuted minister may change the scene of his labours, and thus flee from one city to another: but he must not run away from his work, or shelter himself from danger in those places where he can have no opportunity of usefulness. They who most honour God by confidence in him, and zeal for his glory, shall be peculiarly honoured by him: but such as appear to distrust him, and to despise his word, will be proportionably disgraced, rebuked, and laid aside. The Lord can raise up friends to his people, where they least expected them: and he will honour and recompense those who show kindness to such as are persecuted and oppressed for his sake.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVII. V. 1. Jehoiakim. As Zedekiah is afterwards mentioned through this whole transaction, it seems to have been by an error of some early transcriber, that the name of Jehoiakim is here substituted. Yet several interpreters suppose, that the prophet had the vision in the reign of Jehoiakim; but was not ordered to make the yokes and bonds according to it, till the reign of Ze-

2 Thus * saith the LORD to me; [b] Make thee bonds and yokes, and [c] put them upon thy neck,

3 And send them [d] to the king of Edom, and to the king of Moab, and to the king of the Ammonites, and to the king of Tyrus, and to the king of Zidon, by the hand of [e] the messengers which come to Jerusalem unto Zedekiah king of Judah;

4 And command them † to say unto their masters, Thus saith [f] the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel, thus shall ye say unto your masters;

5 I have [g] made the earth, the man, and the beasts that are upon the ground, by my great power, and by my outstretched arm, [h] and have given it unto whom it seemed meet unto me.

6 And now have [i] I given all these lands into the hand of Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon, [k] my servant, [l] and the beasts of the field have I given him also to serve him.

7 And [m] all nations shall serve him, and his son, and his son's son, [n] until the very time of his land come: and then [o] many nations and great kings shall serve themselves of him.

8 And it shall come to pass, that the nation and kingdom which will not serve the same Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon, and that will not put their neck under the yoke of the king of Babylon, [p] that nation will I punish, saith the LORD, with the sword, and with the famine, and with the pestilence, until I have consumed them by his hand.

dekiah. Thus: 'In the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim,' 'the word of the Lord came to Jeremiah, to be afterward 'executed in the reign of Zedekiah.' (Bp. Hall.) The former, however, seems the most natural supposition; and in a very few instances it is absolutely necessary to have recourse to this method of solving difficulties. (Zech. xi. 12, 13. Matt. xxvii. 9.) 'Such little verbal mistakes 'must be allowed, by all impartial readers, to have some 'times happened in transcribing the Scriptures, as well as 'in other books; and may easily be corrected, by com- 'paring the suspected reading with other parts of the sa- 'cred text, which admit of no difficulty or uncertainty.' (Lowth.) The Septuagint has not this first verse.

V. 2, 3. The kings of these nations seem to have entered into an alliance against the growing power of Nebuchadnezzar, and to have sent ambassadors to Zedekiah to induce him to accede to the treaty. But as it had been before repeatedly predicted, that they should be subjugated by the king of Babylon, this was a vain attempt to frustrate the purpose of God. Jeremiah was therefore ordered to make yokes of wood, like those that were put upon the oxen; and bonds, such as were used to fasten them: and wearing one on his own neck to excite their attention, he was directed to send one to each of the confederating kings, with the following message, by the ambassadors. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4—9. 'God is the sole Lord and Proprietor of 'the world; and by virtue of his absolute sovereignty, 'has a right to give the kingdoms of the earth to whom- 'soever he pleases, (Dan. iv. 17.) and he exercises this 'authority, by "changing times and seasons," by "re- "moving kings and setting up kings." 'It is the busi- 'ness of human laws to establish every government in that 'method, wherein it is already settled: but as this is no 'bar to Providence, who still has a right to alter govern- 'ments, and for great and wise reasons often changes 'the scene of worldly affairs; so neither ought it to be 'an objection against submitting to any persons, whom 'God's providence hath placed over us, and put into their 'hands the full power of exercising all those acts of go- 'vernment in which sovereignty consists. But although 'the people are bound in such cases to obey, yet this does 'not lessen the guilt of usurpers.' (Lowth.) There was a peculiar grandeur, as well as propriety, in this mode of predicting Nebuchadnezzar's rapid successes. The God of Israel, declaring himself to be the Lord of all armies, and the Creator and owner of the whole earth, with all its inhabitants and productions, and claiming full sovereignty over all his creatures, avows his determination, (for reasons which he does not deign to assign,) to give all the countries in that part of the world to the king of Babylon, whom he calls his servant, because he would accomplish an important part of his most righteous designs. They, therefore, who would escape the most dreadful judgments, must submit to the God of Israel by submitting to Nebuchadnezzar; they must hearken to, (believe and obey,) the prophets of Israel, and not to their own diviners and enchanters; and they must observe, that Nebuchadnezzar, and his son, and grandson, would, whatever opposition might be made, possess the full dominion of all these countries; but that, when the appointed time was expired, these haughty conquerors and cruel oppressors would, in their turn, become the prey of other powerful conquerors and oppressors.—This prophecy would, no doubt, be made known, in some degree, among the principal persons in the adjacent countries; and though for the present neglected, when it received its exact accomplishment, it must have been a very conclusive proof, that the God of Israel was the only true God, and the Sovereign of the whole earth, and "that he "did according to his will among the inhabitants of the

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Ministers should always take the lead in every kind of self-denial or self-abasement, which they inculcate on others; and they will be supported under every hardship, which they meet with in the path of duty. Opposition to the growing power and despotic rule of earthly conquerors and tyrants, should always be conducted in submission to the authority of God, and with every means of obtaining his peace and favour: for the most powerful confederacies will be broken, that are cemented by impiety and rebellion against him. The whole earth is the property, as well as the work of its omnipotent Creator; and he giveth it to whomsoever it seemeth meet to him: but the character of those who have had the largest share of its power and riches allotted to them, teaches us how very worthless he deems such acquisitions, compared with spiritual blessings. The Lord does not now expressly inform us, whom he hath appointed to rule the nations; and therefore the efforts of men to defend their liberties from usurpers or invaders, are not indiscriminately to be condemned. But when his will is made known by the event, it behooves us in our private capacity to consider "the powers that be "as ordained of God," and to submit to them according to the laws and constitution of our country; without respect to their characters or conduct, for which they must render an account to their own Master. As every comfort or calamity is at the disposal of God; it must in all cases be our interest to obey his will, by what means soever it is made known: and they who will not believe this, will be convinced of it by the event, and of the fallacy of all the reasonings and devices, by which they were encouraged to seek happiness in following their own inclinations. But if all men are bound to obey God, as far as they are able in any way to discover his will, how inexcusable are they, who live at the fountain-head of instruction, and have repeated warnings, exhortations, and encouragements sent to them, and yet persist in their rebellion! They may be said to be in love with death, and bent on their own destruction: and those who encourage them to expect impunity, by contradicting God's word and speaking lies in his name, are more criminal than the diviners and sorcerers of the Gentiles, and will be answerable for the souls which perish by their means. But time-servers, who accommodate their instructions to the inclinations and wishes of men, especially of those in authority, will too generally be more acceptable to the great, than the faithful ministers of Christ. Yet whilst they promise the impenitent and unbelieving increasing prosperity, they have no power or interest in heaven, by which they may avert the most dreadful calamities: and it will be too late to remedy the mischief, when the event has proved them deceivers. But if it be better to submit to those whom Providence places over us, and to live in peace and to eat the bread of honesty by labour, than to seek great things by turbulence and hazarding the loss of life or property, how good must it be to submit to Christ, "whose yoke is easy and whose burden is "light, that we may find rest to our souls!" For all, who refuse this subjection and neglect his salvation, must be finally and eternally miserable; notwithstanding all their own presumptuous hopes, and the delusions of those who confidently promise them safety in unbelief and disobedience.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVIII. V. 1. 'This plainly refers to the 'time specified, at the beginning of the former chapter, 'and confirms the conjecture there made, that Jehoiakim 'is put there, by a mistake of the copies, for Zedekiah.' (Lowth.) (Note, xxvii. 1.)

V. 2—4. This false prophet imitated the style and manner of the true prophets: but he unconditionally promised prosperity to an abandoned generation; and did not so much as exhort them to repentance or reformation; (xxiii. 14. 17.) It was just such a message as some men call pure Gospel; all encouragement, promise, and privilege, without warning, discrimination of character, exhortation, or precept.

Jeconiah. 'This was grateful news to the people, who 'looked upon Zedekiah only as Nebuchadnezzar's deputy.' (Lowth.) It seems by this, that Hananiah was more desirous of popular than regal favour: for his prediction could not be altogether agreeable to Zedekiah. But he evidently was a weak as well as a wicked prince, and was very generally despised.

V. 6. Amen, &c. The prophet thus expressed his fervent love to his people. He would have been glad that

7 Nevertheless, hear thou now this word that I speak in thine ears, and in the ears of all the people:

8 The prophets that have been before me, and before thee of old, [l] prophesied both against many countries, and against great kingdoms, of war, and of evil, and of pestilence.

9 The prophet which prophesieth of peace, when the word of the prophet shall come to pass, [m] then shall the prophet be known, that the LORD hath truly sent him.

10 ¶ Then Hananiah the prophet [n] took the yoke from off the prophet Jeremiah's neck, and brake it.

11 And Hananiah spake in the presence of all the people, saying, [o] Thus saith the LORD; [p] Even so will I break the yoke of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon from the neck of all nations, within the space of two full years. And the prophet Jeremiah went his way.

12 Then the word of the LORD came unto Jeremiah the prophet, after that Hananiah the prophet had broken the yoke from off the neck of the prophet Jeremiah, saying, 13 Go and tell Hananiah, saying, Thus saith the LORD; [q] Thou hast broken the yokes of wood; but thou shalt make for them yokes of iron.

14 For thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel: [r] I have put a yoke of iron upon the neck of all these nations, [s] that they may serve Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, and they shall serve him: [t] and I have given him the beasts of the field also.

15 Then said the prophet Jeremiah unto Hananiah the prophet, Hear now, Hananiah; [u] The LORD hath not sent thee, but thou makest this people to trust in a lie.

16 Therefore thus saith the LORD; Behold, I will cast thee from off the face of the earth: [x] this year thou shalt die, because thou hast taught * rebellion against the LORD.

17 So [y] Hananiah the prophet died the same year, in the seventh month.

the predicted miseries should be averted, though he might incur the disgrace of being deemed a false prophet; and if his prayers could have prevailed, this would have been the case: but though he prayed for the people, he must prophesy against them, whilst they continued in their sins. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 8, 9. All the prophets, that God had raised up among the Jews, had predicted great calamities to guilty nations, which had either come upon them, or been averted by repentance. So that they who opposed Jeremiah would have opposed all that preceded him, for the same reasons. But it had not been so common for prophets to be sent merely to assure the people of peace: and it was altogether unprecedented, for a true prophet to promise deliverance to a guilty nation, without calling them to repentance. The event must therefore show whether Jeremiah or his opponent was sent of God: for one of them must be a false prophet, as their predictions flatly contradicted each other. 'Jeremiah offers two reasons; '—first, Many other prophets agreed with him in pro-'phesying evil against the Jews; such as Hosea, Joel, 'Amos, Isaiah, Micah, Habakkuk, Zephaniah: whereas 'Hananiah was single in his prophecy. Secondly,—'Considering the general corruption of the people's man-'ners, it was the more likely God should inflict severe 'judgments on them.' (Lowth.)

V. 10. Jeremiah continued to wear the yoke before all the people, in order the more forcibly to impress their minds with the certainty of the events signified by this emblem. But Hananiah violently took the yoke from him, and brake it, to give the greater credit to his prediction.

V. 11. As the prophet had no message to deliver on this occasion, he would not enter into any further altercation with so violent a man; but waited till God directed him what to say and do.

V. 13. Yokes of iron would be more galling, as well as stronger, than yokes of wood; which implied that every effort of the nations, to resist the power of Nebuchadnezzar, would render their bondage more rigorous: as Hananiah's prophecies tended to encourage this unavailing resistance, it is said that he would make them yokes of iron.

V. 16. (xxvii. 12—22.) Hananiah's false prophecy not only encouraged the people in wickedness, but in refusing subjection to the Chaldeans, which God expressly commanded.

V. 17. 'Seeing this thing was evident in the eyes of 'the people, and yet they returned not to the Lord; it is 'manifest, that miracles cannot move us, neither the 'word itself, except God touch the heart.'

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

No true prophet ever delivered his message with greater confidence, than false prophets have expressed when speaking lies in the name of God: and yet some well-meaning people are apt to regard men the more for being positive, as if it were an evidence of their being in the right. But that which renders false teachers acceptable to multitudes, evidently distinguishes them from the faithful servants of God: namely, the coincidence of their doctrine with the pride and self flattery of the human heart; and its tendency to encourage impenitent sinners with the hopes of impu-

Jeremiah, by letter, requires the captives at Babylon to accommodate themselves to their condition; and not to believe the false prophets, who promised them a speedy deliverance, 1—9. He promises them a gracious restoration at the end of seventy years, 10—14. He foretels the destruction of those who remained at Jerusalem, 15—19; and shows the dreadful end of two false prophets at Babylon, 20—23. Shemaiah, writes a letter from Babylon against Jeremiah, 24—29. His doom is foretold, 30—32.

nity and prosperity. This so flatly contradicts the whole tenour of Scripture, that none, who are acquainted with it and reverence it, can be deluded by them. Those ministers who are most full of love and compassion for sinners, and most fervently pray for and seek their salvation, will be the most determined not to flatter their pride, nor soothe their consciences, with delusive hopes. They will most plainly declare the alarming as well as the encouraging parts of the sacred oracles; and call men to repentance, faith, and holiness, as indispensably necessary in order to escape the present and future wrath of God. Such as are most solemn in these warnings and exhortations, copy the examples of the prophets and apostles, and men of God, who have been before them: but smooth teachers, who deal only in comfort and unqualified promises and assurances of peace and safety, without discriminating betwixt the precious and the vile among the people, tread in the steps of the false prophets, and the event will prove that the Lord did not send them: while the tendency of false doctrine, to teach men rebellion against God, always distinguishes it from the true Gospel of Christ, which encourages men to repent, and turn to God, and to do works meet for repentance; but gives no encouragement to continue in sin. —"The servant of the Lord must not strive, but be gentle "unto all men." He must recede from his right, yield to violence, bear reviling with patience, and leave God to vindicate his character and plead his cause. The truth may be run down, overborne, and trampled on; but it cannot be kept down; like its divine Author, it will rise again, to the confusion of all who hate it. Every attempt of ungodly men to escape the wrath, or frustrate the purpose of God, will rivet their fetters and increase their miseries: and they, who encourage them in such rebellious efforts, by causing them to trust in a lie, must expect the first, or the largest, portion of divine vengeance.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIX. V. 1. Residue. Many of the elders, and others might die, by the hardships which they suffered on the road; or be cut off by the conquerors.

—Prophets. It does not appear that there was any true prophet at Babylon, when this letter was sent; except Ezekiel, and Daniel, who was newly entered on the prophetical office. But there were several, who were accounted prophets, and who had great influence over the people; and therefore the letter was addressed to them, along with the elders and priests. The Septuagint read it, false prophets, but they would hardly, in that character, have been thus addressed; especially as the letter was particularly intended to warn the people against the false prophets.

V. 2. Queen Jeconiah's mother. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. These persons seem to have been sent by Zedekiah, to ratify some treaty with Nebuchadnezzar, or to make some submissions to him.

V. 4—7. The vain expectation of a speedy return to their own land, which the false prophets excited in the Jews at Babylon, led them to neglect their own interests and comfort, and the good of the nation; and tended to betray them into measures that would excite the jealousy of the victors, and increase their own miseries. But the prophet, in the name of God, directed them to consider Babylon as their home, and to take the best care they could of themselves, their families, and the nation; to use their influence and endeavours to promote the public peace; and to pray for the welfare of the city, as the way to obtain peace to themselves. These directions tended to render them patient and contented, industrious and useful, and as comfortable as their situation would admit of. This deportment, and their constant prayers in all their religious assemblies, for the welfare of the community, would tend to conciliate the rulers. Most of them must end their lives at Babylon, and share the calamities and many of the advantages of that city, all their days; and their posterity must do the same, till the expiration of the appointed period. It was therefore both reasonable and prudent to pray, that there might be peace in that place where the Lord had assigned them their habitations: and as far as they believed his word they would do it. The Lord had caused them to be carried captive, or all the power of the Chaldeans could not have effected it: and his will ought to be submitted to in this dispensation. (20.) 'It is the duty 'of all private persons to submit to the government that 'protects them, and to pray for the prosperity of it. And 'if they are persecutors, or enemies to the truth, they are 'to leave it to God to execute on them the judgments he 'has denounced against tyrants and oppressors; which 'threatenings the Jews expected God would execute upon 'Babylon in due time.' (Ps. cxxxvii. 8, 9.) (Lowth.)—To pray for the peace of a city or country, and for the health or eternal salvation of the rulers, is very different from wishing success to their ambitious, rapacious, or sanguinary undertakings; though this distinction is not always attended to. May not the surprising change, which took place in the character of Nebuchadnezzar, (Notes, Dan. iv.) be considered as an answer to the prayers of the pious Jews for him; as the conversion of Saul was to the prayers of the Christians for their persecutors? And may not even they, who live under the most oppressive persecutors, take an encouraging hint from this consideration, as to their duty in such circumstances?

V. 8. Cause, &c. By the encouragement which the Jews gave to those who promised them speedy deliverance, they, as it were, bespoke these dreams; and unprincipled men would be sure to furnish such prognostications as they found acceptable to the people.

V. 10. (Notes, 2 Chr. xxxvi. 21. Ezra i. 1. vi. 6—15. Dan. ix. 1. Zech. i. 12, 13.) 'But few, in comparison of 'these, returned in person into their own country: so 'this promise was chiefly fulfilled to their posterity: and 'it is common in Scripture to speak of blessings bestowed 'upon the children, as if they had actually been made 'good to their progenitors.' (Lowth.)

V. 11—14. The Lord had his plan before him, and neither the impatience of the Jews, nor the power of the Chaldeans could alter it. He had determined, that the Chaldean monarchy should continue till the seventy years expired, and so long the Jews must remain in captivity. But he had thoughts of peace and not of evil to those who were already at Babylon: (Notes, xxiv.) Their calamities were intended for their good, and he would in due time give them that happy deliverance which they expected, or an end, even their hope. Other benefits, personal or public, spiritual or temporal, they might in the mean time obtain by prayer; and they might pray to be delivered in the appointed season: but when it arrived, the Lord "would pour upon them the Spirit of grace and supplication," and lead them to fervent prayer, and great earnestness, by every means to seek his favour; and they would do it with their whole heart, and succeed, and then their captivity would be terminated. By consulting the marginal references, the reader will see, that the termination of the judgments brought on the nation by their sins, in answer to their penitent fervent prayers, had been pointed out by Moses and the prophets; and the same is foretold by Zecariah, as the introduction to the restoration of the Jews from their present dispersions, (which some think to be here predicted, as well as their return from Babylon.) (Note, Zech. xii. 10—14.)

V. 15. 'As Ahab, Zedekiah, and Shemaiah.' (21. 25.)

16 Know that thus saith the LORD, [y] of the king that sitteth upon the throne of David, and of all the people that dwelleth in this city, and of your brethren that are not gone forth with you into captivity;

17 Thus saith the LORD of hosts; Behold, I will send upon them the sword, the famine, and the pestilence, and will [a] make them like vile figs, that cannot be eaten, they are so evil.

18 And I will persecute them with the sword, with the famine, and with the pestilence, and [a] will deliver them to be removed to all the kingdoms of the earth, * to be a curse, and an astonishment, and an hissing, and a reproach, among all the nations, whither I have driven them:

19 Because [b] they have not hearkened to my words, saith the LORD, which I sent unto them by my servants the prophets, rising up early and sending them; but ye would not hear, saith the LORD.

20 Hear ye therefore the word of the LORD, all ye of the captivity, [c] whom I have sent from Jerusalem to Babylon:

21 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel, of Ahab the son of Kolaiah, and of Zedekiah the son of Maaseiah, [d] which prophesy a lie unto you in my name; Behold, I will deliver them into the hand of Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon; and he shall slay them before your eyes;

22 And of them [e] shall be taken up a curse by all the captivity of Judah which are in Babylon, saying, The LORD make thee like Zedekiah and like Ahab, whom the king of Babylon [f] roasted in the fire;

23 Because they have committed villany in Israel, and [g] have committed adultery with their neighbours' wives, and have spoken lying words in my name, which I have not commanded them; [h] even I know, and am a witness, saith the LORD.

24 ¶ Thus shalt thou also speak to Shemaiah the † Nehelamite, saying,

25 Thus speaketh the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel, saying, [i] Because thou hast sent letters in thy name unto all the people that are at Jerusalem, and to [k] Zephaniah the son of Maaseiah the priest, and to all the priests, saying,

26 The LORD hath made thee priest in the stead of Jehoiada the priest, that ye should be [l] officers in the house of the LORD, [m] for every man that is mad, [n] and maketh himself a prophet, [o] that thou shouldest put him in prison, and in the stocks.

27 Now [p] therefore why hast thou not reproved Jeremiah of Anathoth, [q] which maketh himself a prophet to you?

28 For therefore he sent unto us in Babylon, saying, [r] This captivity is long: build ye houses, and dwell in them; and plant gardens, and eat the fruit of them.

29 And [s] Zephaniah the priest read this letter in the ears of Jeremiah the prophet.

30 Then came the word of the LORD unto Jeremiah, saying,

31 Send to all them of the captivity, saying, Thus saith the LORD concerning Shemaiah the Nehelamite; [t] Because that Shemaiah hath prophesied unto you, and I sent him not, and he caused you to trust in a lie;

32 Therefore thus saith the LORD; Behold, [u] I will punish Shemaiah the Nehelamite, and his seed: [x] he shall not have a man to dwell among this people; neither shall he [y] behold the good that I will do for my people, saith the LORD;

V. 21—23. It is probable that these false prophets excited the people to make disturbances, or at least to be disaffected to the government; and this so offended Nebuchadnezzar, that he put them to death in a most cruel manner, to deter others from such seditious practices. For it pleased God to deliver them into his hand, that he might punish them for their atrocious wickedness, as well as for their lying predictions. It seems that the people did not know of their villany and adulteries, till the Lord testified against them, and by exposing their secret crimes put men on their guard against their seductions. The accomplishment of this dreadful prediction would have a great effect upon the minds of the Jews; and when they were enraged against any one, they would not be able to think of a more dreadful imprecation, than to wish them like Ahab and Zedekiah. The event seems to have confirmed Jeremiah's predictions, that the captives were taken off from hearkening to false prophets, and rendered more quiet in their situation.

CHAP. XXX.

Prophecies of the restoration of the Jews, and the rebuilding of their city and temple; notwithstanding their extreme calamities, the justice of their punishment, the failure of all human help, and their own desponding thoughts, 1—18: of their subsequent increase and prosperity under their own rulers; and of the destruction of their enemies and the wicked, 19—24.

V. 24—32. Shemaiah seems to have written back by Zedekiah's messengers. The word Nehelamite signifies a dreamer. Jeremiah had been a prophet for a long course of years: so that even the captivity of Jeconiah and the Jews had been repeatedly and expressly predicted by him: yet Shemaiah, (pretending to be a prophet) thought himself authorized to treat him with the most decided contempt: and by a circular letter, in his own name, and not in that of the elders of the people, and directed to the priests and people at Jerusalem, he excited them to silence and punish him! His letter was particularly addressed to Zephaniah, who had succeeded Jehoiada, in superintending the affairs of the temple. Zephaniah is elsewhere called "the second priest," under Seraiah the high priest, (lii. 24.) who, some think, was also called Jehoiada. Shemaiah thought that Zephaniah neglected his duty, in not calling Jeremiah to a severe account for his predictions, which seemed to him one great end of his advancement. Jeremiah had long been owned of God, as his appointed prophet, and Shemaiah ran without being sent; yet he charged Jeremiah with making himself a prophet, probably because the chief priests generally opposed him. And though his predictions coincided with the whole tenour of their Scriptures, yet he wanted to have him confined as a mad man, and severely punished; because he would not flatter his wicked countrymen with the hopes of prosperity! Zephaniah seems not to have regarded the letter, and perhaps was favourably disposed to Jeremiah; (xxi. 1.) But the Lord ordered his prophet to denounce the doom of Shemaiah and of his family: and doubtless he took the first opportunity of transmitting the sentence to him. 'He and his 'seed shall be destroyed, so that none of them shall see 'the benefit of this deliverance.'

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

The zealous servant of God considers himself as bound to use every means in his power to profit those who are far off, as well as those that are near. Writing is peculiarly profitable in this respect; and it is rendered immensely more beneficial by the invention of printing, in circulating the knowledge of the word of God. Alas, that these useful discoveries should be so generally abused to contrary purposes! Submission to Providence is always our duty and interest; and it is as foolish as it is ungrateful, to undervalue and reject the comforts within our reach, by repining for the want of those which we cannot obtain. The interests of the Church, or of posterity, should by no means be neglected, because we may not live to witness or share them. Wherever our lot is cast, we ought to approve ourselves peaceable members of the community, even though subjected to hardship and oppression: considering our situation and its disadvantages as the appointment of God; and assured that good behaviour will render it more tolerable than turbulence and faction; it is our duty to pray for the peace of the country in which we reside, and the welfare of those rulers who afford us any measure of protection: and if this was the duty of the Jews at Babylon, and of the Christians under Nero, it must be that of all the people of God in every age and place. Christians should therefore exceedingly fear being seduced into factious measures, which are contrary to Scripture and disgraceful to the Gospel. And as no pre-intimations are given us of those great revolutions, by which power passes from one to another; and which are generally effected by those in public situations, or by popular assemblies; it behooves us in our private stations to study to be quiet, and to mind our own business. The promises of God will certainly be performed in their appointed season; but that must be waited for, in the use of authorized means alone. We know not what the thoughts of God are, respecting our personal concerns, and he hath put the times and seasons in his own power; but it should suffice us to know, in general, that he hath thoughts of good, and not of evil, towards his Church, which shall at length have an expected end of its long continued oppression; and that all things shall work together for the believer's good till his trials are ended, and his most enlarged hopes are vastly exceeded in the rest and felicity of heaven. In general, we are assured that all who seek the Lord, and call upon him, and search for him with their whole hearts, shall find him, and be made joyful in his salvation: and that the Lord introduces great revivals of religion, by exciting his people to fervent prayers and supplications. Thus they go forth to meet him, when he comes to perform his promises: and thus let us seek for that prevalence of the Gospel, which he hath taught us to expect.

V. 15—32.

Let all beware how they call those teachers, "whom they "heap to themselves after their own lusts," prophets whom the Lord has raised up unto them; or those dreams, which they cause to be dreamed coincident with their inclinations, revelations from God. The mistake is often fatal: and the teacher and his message should be carefully compared with the Scriptures, and the nature, tendency, and effects of them, well weighed. The Lord is immutable in his purposes and will surely be true to his word, both in punishing impenitent sinners, and in saving all who obey his Gospel: and it is vain to attempt new modelling religion, by leaving out alarming and offensive truths, in order to render it more palatable to the vitiated minds of sinners. In this way men deceive themselves, and are

THE [a] word that came to Jeremiah from the LORD, saying,

2 Thus speaketh the LORD God of Israel, saying, [b] Write thee all the words that I have spoken unto thee in a book.

3 For, lo, [c] the days come, saith the LORD, [d] that I will bring again the captivity of my people Israel and Judah, saith the LORD: [e] and I will cause them to return to the land that I gave to their fathers, and they shall possess it.

4 ¶ And these are the words that the LORD spake concerning Israel, and concerning Judah.

5 For thus saith the LORD; We have heard [f] a voice of trembling, * of fear, and not of peace.

6 Ask ye now, and see, whether † a man doth travail with child? wherefore do I see [g] every man with his hands on his loins, as a woman in travail, and all faces are turned into [h] paleness?

7 Alas! [i] for that day is great, [k] so that none is like it: [l] it is even the time of Jacob's trouble; [m] but he shall be saved out of it.

8 For it shall come to pass in that day, saith the LORD of hosts, that [n] I will break his yoke from off thy neck, and will burst thy bonds, and strangers shall no more [o] serve themselves of him:

9 But they shall [p] serve the LORD their God, and David their king, whom I will raise up unto them.

deceived by Satan transformed into an angel of light: and then they are employed as his ministers transformed into ministers of righteousness, whose end will be according to their works. For the heart-searching God often beholds much villany in those who teach a smooth and deceitful gospel; they frequently have their secret reasons for encouraging men to indulge their lusts; otherwise what hope could they themselves have of escaping the damnation of hell? And it is an unspeakable mercy to numbers, when the crimes of such deceivers are detected, to prevent the pernicious effects of their licentious or skeptical tenets: but if they continue impenitent, they will at length become the most miserable and execrated of mankind. It should never be forgotten, that they who are evidently walking in the broad road, are altogether improper persons to teach others the way to heaven. Yet men of this character commonly treat the servants of God with peculiar rage or scorn: they are officious and intermeddling, and often instigate their superiors to persecute, when they have it not in their own power. Many of them think that authority, especially ecclesiastical authority, is chiefly useful in enabling those who possess it to silence and punish the laborious ministers, whose preaching detects their hypocrisy, and whose example shames their sloth and avarice: they make loud outcries that the Church is betrayed by its rulers, when the ministers of God are unmolested. In their judgment the zealous active preacher is a madman, or a fool, or worse: let who will be tolerated, he ought to be disgraced and silenced; and a prison and the stocks are his just desert. It is happy for mankind, that men of this stamp generally want power adequate to their malice; and that those of greater moderation have the management of such affairs. All the accusations brought against many laborious teachers of modern times, when fairly examined, amount to no more than this; they earnestly counsel men to attend to their true interests and present duties, and not to expect impunity in sin, or in neglect of God's salvation; but to wait for the performance of his promises in his appointed way, and in obedience to his commandments; and these words of truth and soberness are called madness and enthusiasm, by numbers who scarcely ever looked into the word of God! They who are thus inveterate against the truth, and those who preach it, will not behold the good that the Lord will do unto his people; but will be punished according as they have taught rebellion against him.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXX. V. 2, 3. This and some of the following chapters contain predictions as encouraging as the preceding chapters were alarming. The prophet was ordered to write in a book, for the use of posterity, "all "the words that the LORD had spoken to him." This seems to refer to the whole of his prophecies, and not to this particular message; and it is supposed that an abstract of all his predictions has been transmitted to us. JEHOVAH intended to restore the Jews to their own land, and to continue his worship among them: and the whole of Jeremiah's predictions would be of great use to them. As his contemporaries had almost universally neglected his warnings and exhortations, the prophet might be tempted to conclude that his labours were in vain: but this was by no means the case; for his writings would convince, lead to repentance, and encourage the Jews, during their captivity; at the approach of their deliverance, they would direct their measures, and put energy into their prayers; and after that event, they would tend to establish successive generations in the worship of God, who had predicted and effected all these surprising events: they would excite their praises to him for performing his promises, warn them against idolatry and iniquity, and animate them to obedience. Nay, this weeping prophet (who seems a peculiar instance of one every way fitted for usefulness, labouring for years with very little visible success,) has been made abundantly useful to the Church of God, for above two thousand years already, and will continue to be so to the end of the world.

Israel and Judah. 'Several prophecies foretel the re-'storation both of Israel and Judah, and their re-union 'after their restoration.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

10 Therefore [q] fear thou not, O my servant Jacob, saith the LORD; neither be dismayed, O Israel: for, lo, [r] I will save thee from afar, and thy seed from the land of their captivity; and Jacob shall return, [s] and shall be in rest, and be quiet, and none shall make him afraid.

11 For I [t] am with thee, saith the LORD, to save thee: [u] though I make a full end of all nations whither I have scattered thee, yet will I not make a full end of thee: [x] but I will correct thee in measure, and will not leave thee altogether unpunished.

12 For thus saith the LORD, [y] Thy bruise is incurable, and thy wound is grievous.

13 There is [z] none to plead thy cause, * that thou mayest be bound up: [a] thou hast no healing medicines.

14 All [b] thy lovers have forgotten thee; they seek thee not, for [c] I have wounded thee with the wound of an enemy, with the chastisement of a cruel one, for the multitude of thine iniquity; [d] because thy sins were increased.

15 [d] Why criest thou for thine affliction? [f] thy sorrow is incurable [g] for the multitude of thine iniquity: because thy sins were increased, I have done these things unto thee.

16 Therefore [h] all they that devour thee shall be devoured; and all thine adversaries, every one of them, shall go into captivity; and they that spoil thee shall be a spoil, and all that prey upon thee will I give for a prey.

17 For [i] I will restore health unto thee, and I will heal thee of thy wounds, saith the LORD; because [k] they called thee an Outcast, saying, This is Zion, whom no man seeketh after.

18 Thus saith the LORD; [l] Behold, I will bring again the captivity of Jacob's tents, and have mercy on his dwelling-places; and [m] the city shall be builded upon her own † heap, and [n] the palace shall remain after the manner thereof.

V. 5—9. The Lord here introduces further assurances of merciful deliverance, by speaking of the approaching miseries of the Jews as already come upon them. They had disregarded the predictions of these calamities: but they are here represented as hearing a voice of trembling and fear, and not of peace: and the dismay and distress would be so general and extreme, that every man in Jerusalem would be seen in anguish, resembling that of a woman in travail; and all would be enfeebled, pale, and fainting. Indeed this would be a day of so great affliction, that none had ever been like it; and it might emphatically be called the day of Jacob's trouble: but it would as certainly precede their deliverance, as the pangs of travail do the joy of the mother "that a child is "born into the world:" and the nation would certainly survive and be saved out of these distresses. In that day, (namely, the day of their deliverance,) the Chaldean yoke would be broken from off them, and they would be rescued from the oppression of strangers; and being weaned from their idolatry, they would adhere to the worship and service of God, and live under the rulers whom he would place over them, of the lineage of David, or favoured like David. Doubtless this looks forward to the days of Christ, the son of David, and sometimes called David or the Beloved, whose coming was introduced by that dispensation which commenced with the deliverance of the Jews from captivity.

Strangers, &c. 'This promise has not received its 'accomplishment. Since, after the return of the Jews 'under Cyrus, they were reduced into servitude by the 'Greeks and Romans; and at present there is no part of 'the world, where they can be said to be their own 'masters.'

David. 'That is the Messiah, who is often called by 'the name of David, 'as the person, in whom all the 'promises made to David, were to be fulfilled.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10, 11. (Marg. Ref.) God hath made a full end of the Egyptians, Syrians, Assyrians, Chaldeans, Medes and Persians, and Macedonians, and of the Pagan Roman empire, which successively scattered or oppressed Israel, so that each of them has been inseparably united with the conquering nation: yet the Jews, by an unprecedented interposition of Providence, after all their oppressions and dispersions, are preserved a distinct people to this present day! How wonderfully do undeniable facts demonstrate the divine inspiration of the Scriptures! No doubt the future restoration of that people from their present dispersions and quiet settlement in Canaan, will in a still more astonishing manner, attest the same most important truth, to the conviction and conversion of the nations of the earth.

V. 12—18. The Lord here speaks of the condition of the Jewish nation, in the extremity of their distresses, as it appeared to them and to others; and as it would have been without his immediate interposition. Their bruises were incurable by any human power, they had been so grievously wounded. None had skill to effect a cure, or to bind up their wounds, nor had they any healing medicines. None could plead for them with the victors, to restore them to their land, or to show them favour; nor had they any means of recovering liberty, and re-establishing their Church and state, or even of rendering their bondage more gentle. All the nations, whose alliance they had courted, whose idolatries they had copied, and who professed great love to them, had forgotten them, and desired no further acquaintance with them. JEHOVAH himself seemed to fight against them as an enemy: his chastisement was very severe, and like that of a cruel one; for he had been provoked to it by their multiplied iniquities. It was therefore in vain for them to lament their miseries, or complain of hard usage: their sorrow was incurable by any other hand than that which had inflicted it; and in order to obtain that, they must submit to him, and acknowledge his justice in their punishment. Nevertheless, though they suffered justly, and could not help themselves, yet he intended to appear for them, and to retaliate on those who had devoured them and carried them captive; he would bind up and heal the wounds, of which the nation lay as it were expiring: and because the heathen insulted over the Jews as outcasts, and Zion as deserted and disregarded, he promised, in mercy to the people, to cause their habitations throughout the land to be re-built, as well as the city, upon its old foundation, which during the captivity was a heap of ruins; and that the temple should be restored, and remain, after the ancient manner, the centre of their worship, and the place of their solemn feasts and sacrifices.

V. 19—22. After the captivity the Jews should have abundant cause for joy and thanksgiving: for the Lord promised that he would exceedingly multiply and prosper them: their posterity should be taken care of, as the children of the covenant, in the same manner as they had been in former ages; the whole nation should be established as his congregation; and their oppressors should be severely punished. They would also be governed by magistrates of their own nation, and not of the Gentiles, as during the captivity; and even their chief governor would be raised up from among themselves: the Lord would cause him to draw near unto him, to inquire his will, and present his appointed worship; for who, (except thus taught, and drawn of God,) had ever engaged his heart to approach unto the Lord? Thus they would become the Lord's people, and he would again be known as their God.—This prophecy was accomplished in some measure by the increase and prosperity of the Jews in their own land, under the government of several rulers of their own nation, who for a long time were the high priests, that by office drew near before God, even into the most holy place, as the typical intercessors for the people whom they governed. Yet the Jews were seldom, if ever, free from dependance on strangers, and were frequently oppressed by them after the captivity; and many of their rulers were far from meriting the character here given. But when Christ arose, and was advanced to the mediatorial throne, as High Priest and King in one person, and in this character drew near before God, in behalf of his people, having engaged his heart to pass through all his previous sufferings as their all-atoning sacrifice, this prediction had its full accomplishment. And who is this, that engages his heart to undertake so arduous a service? Who is this, that ventures to intercede for sinners before a just and holy God? Is he not the Son of God and the Lord of glory, in whom the Father is well pleased, and whom all the angels of God worship? And, through him, all that believe become the people of God, and he becomes their Portion and Salvation.

Nobles. 'The Hebrew word is singular, and literally 'signifies their mighty One; a title given to God himself. '—They shall no more be governed by strangers, but shall 'have a ruler of their own nation; such was Zerubbabel, 'a figure of Christ. He shall have a near attendance 'on me: for I will make him a Priest as well as a King, 'according to the prophecy concerning the Messias, "Thou art a Priest for ever, after the order of Melchi-"zedek."—'For who is there but the Messias, that is so 'entirely devoted to my service?—The words have an 'emphasis in the original, that cannot be translated, and 'are spoken by way of admiration.—(Lowth.)—Let it be remembered, that Zerubbabel was neither priest nor king, though ruler of the Jews under the kings of Persia.

V. 23, 24. (Note, xxiii. 19, 20.) These verses may be understood of those enemies of the Jews who attempted to hinder their return to their own land; or who afterwards molested or oppressed them: in this sense, they were fulfilled in the subversion of the Babylonish empire; and in the slaughter of those who sought the destruction of the Jews in the days of Esther and Mordecai: and afterwards in the ruin of Antiochus Epiphanes, and those who concurred in his cruel persecutions. But if we explain the preceding verses of Christ and his kingdom, these, most naturally and consistently with the context, refer to the unbelieving Jews themselves, and to the terrible ruin that came on them, for wickedly rejecting and crucifying Christ, and opposing the setting up of his kingdom. These judgments came from the fierce anger of the Lord, and the effects of them continue to this day: and in the latter days the Jewish nation will consider the rejection of that Governor, that proceeded from themselves, as the cause of all their miseries.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—18.

The discoveries which God hath made of his truth and will, have been carefully registered and preserved, for the benefit of future generations: and he speaks to us by the writings of his ancient servants, as plainly as he did to their contemporaries by their mouths: let us then value, and study with humble diligence and obedient faith, these sacred records. They who simply serve God, and are zealous for his glory, will in one way or other be useful to their fellow sinners: some of his ministers are most useful during their lives by their preaching; and others speak most effectually after their death by their writings: but "as every man hath received the gift, so let him minister, "as a good steward of the manifold grace of God:" and "let us not be weary in well doing; for in due season we "shall reap, if we faint not." Sin leads to terror and dismay: they who will not tremble at the word of God, must tremble at his judgments: obstinate transgressors will hear a voice of terror, and not of peace: and if temporal calamities dismay and distress the stoutest and most intrepid, what will be the wrath to come? Afflictions in this world often prove the means of good, and are never entirely without hope; but future punishment will be unmingled hopeless misery. Deep convictions of sin and terrors of conscience, attended with sore temptations and afflictions, often cause a time of trouble so great, that the awakened sinner has never before known any thing like it: but it proves a happy crisis, when attended with "that godly "sorrow which worketh repentance unto salvation not "to be repented of;" and in due time he shall be saved out of it. For our gracious God will pardon his sins, speak peace to his conscience, and break off the yoke of sin and Satan; that, "being delivered from all his enemies, "he may serve him without fear, in righteousness and "true holiness before him," all the remnant of his days, as the redeemed subject of Christ our King, whom the Father hath raised up unto us. The believer also may have days of great affliction and temptations, and even of terror and dismay; but he shall be saved from them all: and even death, which is such a time of trouble as can but once be experienced, will be to him a season of complete deliverance, and an introduction to "the joy of his Lord." Let then none who serve God fear or be dismayed on his own account, or on that of the Church; for victory and triumph await them. Believers shall be gathered from afar, and return from all their dispersions; and faith, with submission to God, will give them rest and quietness here on earth, and none shall durably make them afraid. He will be with them to save them; though he correct them, it shall be in measure, and for their good; and he will not make a full end of them, as of the wicked around them. Yet the wounds and bruises which he sometimes inflicts, seem very grievous, and are incurable by any hand but his. Every effort to heal ourselves must needs prove fruitless; for we have none to plead our cause, that we may be bound up, nor any healing medicines, whilst we neglect the heavenly Advocate and the sanctifying Spirit. All earthly comforts and comforters will soon fail us. When we consider the number and heinousness of our sins, we may be ready to consider God himself as our irreconcileable enemy, and every chastisement as the wound of a cruel one; and so long as we only repine at our affliction, our sorrows remain incurable. But when we are thus driven from every false refuge, and led to acknowledge that God is just in all he inflicts or threatens; the alarming and painful discovery is a preparation for peace and comfort. Thus we are brought to submit to his righteousness and accept of his mercy. Then he rebukes our enemies, and rescues us from the jaws of the devourer: he binds up the broken heart, and cures the sin-distempered soul; and he will complete the salvation that hath been so happily begun. The dealings of his grace, with every true convert and every returning backslider, are exactly the same, upon a smaller scale, as his dealings with the Jews. And in the same manner he corrects, humbles, pardons, heals, and restores offending Churches from age to age: for the Redeemer of Israel is "the same yesterday, to-day, and "for ever."

V. 19—24.

Our God will certainly comfort all those who penitently turn unto him: he will give them abundant blessings and a thankful heart: and when he increases and glorifies his Church, all, who sympathized in its sorrows and prayed for its prosperity, will rejoice and be thankful. It is a great mercy to nations to be ruled by prudent princes and magistrates, who are "of themselves," and have their welfare at heart: but still more so to be governed by those whom the Lord causes to draw near unto him, as his accepted servants and worshippers.—They who approach him, must have their hearts engaged to do it in reverence, devotion, and faith: but who of our sinful race could thus have ventured to approach the holy God, who is a consuming fire to all the workers of iniquity; if Christ our King and High Priest had not engaged to atone for our sins, and were not entered into the true sanctuary, to appear in his presence on our behalf? Through him we find acceptance, and access with boldness to the throne of grace, become his people, and have the Lord for our God. How then will they escape who neglect so great salvation? "For behold, the whirlwind of "the LORD still goeth forth with fury, and his continual in- "dignation will fall with pain on the head of the wicked;" nor "will it return, till he hath performed the intents of "his heart," in the destruction of all those who obey not the Gospel of his Son. May we consider seriously these declarations, and the doom of former enemies of the Gospel: may we duly attend to these things, before those latter days come, when consideration will only increase the anguish of all who have perished without remedy.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXI. V. 1. This is a continuation of the prophecy that was begun in the preceding chapter, which evidently relates to the kingdom of Christ. The same time, therefore, here mentioned, must refer to those events, and to the latter days of the Church. Not only would the Jews be reinstated in their privileges as the people of God; but the same blessing is promised to all the families of Israel. (Note, xxx. 2, 3.) Some Israelites returned with the Jews from Babylon, and perhaps more of them were incorporated among them in the several places where they settled; and many of them were converted to Christianity in the primitive ages: yet these things seem to have formed only a partial accomplishment of this prediction. But "in the latter days," when the Jews "shall "be turned to the Lord, all Israel shall be saved," (Rom. xi. 26.) and then JEHOVAH will emphatically be the God of all the families of Israel: and when the fulness of the Gentiles shall be brought in, even those of Israel, that are inseparably incorporated with them, will find admission into the Church. Several parts in this prophecy seem to look forward thus far: yet various previous events are noticed in the course of it, as introductory to its grand completion.

V. 2. The Israelites who had escaped the murdering sword of Pharaoh, and the hostile attempts of the Amalekites and other enemies, were marvellously preserved and favoured by JEHOVAH in the wilderness; and, notwithstanding their rebellions and chastisements, they were at length put in possession of Canaan, and there established, increased, and prospered, because God went with them, to give them the rest and inheritance which he had promised to their fathers. In like manner the remnant, that escaped the sword of the Chaldeans, would find favour with God, and be re-established in their own land. And after the still more terrible havoc made of them by the Romans, and in their consequent dispersions, similar favours were intended them.

V. 3—5. Israel is here introduced, recollecting how God in times of old had made himself known to their fathers, and appeared for their deliverance, with a silent regret that he now seemed to forsake them. To this the Lord answers, (for saying is not in the original,) that "truly he had loved them with an everlasting love:" from the beginning he had peculiarly favoured the nation, and he would continue thus to favour them to the end: his purposes of love had been from everlasting, and the effects of them would be to everlasting: his loving kindness had drawn them into a special relation to him; and it would yet prevail to bring them again into possession of their privileges, and to re-establish them in prosperity. The nation was considered as a virgin that had been betrothed to him: and instead of mourning as she had done, like one that was deserted and desolate, she should be adorned with festive garments, and express her gladness of heart by such tokens, as young persons employed on joyful occasions. (Marg. Ref.) They would also again possess their own land, at least some part of it, and there plant vineyards which would yield a great increase. Some of the Israelites, who at different periods returned with the Jews from captivity, doubtless got possession of their ancient inheritances; but probably this refers to events yet future; or is spoken figuratively—The word rendered, "shall eat them "as common things," literally signifies, shall profane them. —'It alludes to the law that forbad the fruit of any young 'trees to be eaten, till the fifth year, (Lev. xix. 23—25.) '—when the fruit was—common for every one to eat.' (Deut. xx. 6. xxviii. 30. Marg.) watchmen [q] upon the mount Ephraim shall cry, [r] Arise ye, and let us go up to Zion unto the LORD our God.

7 For thus saith the LORD; [s] Sing with gladness for Jacob, and shout among the chief of the nations: publish ye, praise ye, and say, [t] O LORD, save thy people, [u] the remnant of Israel.

8 Behold, [x] I will bring them from the north country, and gather them [y] from the coasts of the earth, and with [z] them the blind and the lame, the woman with child and her that travaileth with child together: a great company shall return thither.

9 They shall [a] come with weeping, and with * supplications will I lead them: [b] I will cause them to walk by the rivers of waters, [c] in a straight way, wherein they shall not stumble: [d] for I am a Father to Israel, and Ephraim is my first-born.

10 Hear the word of the LORD, O ye nations, [e] and declare it in the isles afar off, and say, [f] He that scattered Israel will gather him, [g] and keep him, as a shepherd doth his flock.

11 For the LORD hath [h] redeemed Jacob, and ransomed him from the hand of him that was stronger than he.

12 Therefore [i] they shall come and sing in [k] the height of Zion, [l] and shall flow together to the goodness of the LORD, [m] for wheat, and for wine, and for oil, and for the young of the flock, and of the herd: [n] and their soul shall be as a watered garden; [o] and they shall not sorrow any more at all.

13 Then [p] shall the virgin rejoice in the dance, both young men and old together: [q] for I will turn their mourning into joy, and will comfort them, and make them rejoice from their sorrow.

14 And I will [r] satiate the soul of the priests with fatness, and [s] my people shall be satisfied with my goodness, saith the LORD.

V. 6, 7. The Jews and Ephraim, or the ten tribes, are here represented as in possession of their own land; and all their former jealousies and divisions are ceased; so that the watchmen, the teachers or prophets of Ephraim, excite the people to resort to mount Zion to worship. This may refer to the union of different nations in the Church of Christ, and their harmonious worship and amicable communion in the privileges and ordinances of the Gospel. This is further intimated, when "among the "chief of the nations" men are called on to rejoice, and praise God for his goodness to Jacob, and to mingle prayers with their praises for the salvation of the remnant of Israel. The most powerful, renowned, and civilized nations at this day, professing Christianity, praising God for his mercies to his ancient people, and praying for the conversion and salvation of the Jews, form a striking accomplishment of this prophecy. But the re-establisment of Judah and Israel in their own land seems to be also foretold.

V. 8, 9. In answer to these prayers, or to excite these praises, the Lord here promises to bring Israel from the utmost coasts of the earth, without excluding the blind, the lame, the woman with child, or even her that travails with child: however feeble or unable they were of themselves, or however distressed in their circumstances or burdened in spirit, under the protection and tender care of God, and willingly assisting each other, they would return in a great company to Zion. Mourning for their sins, nay, weeping even for joy, and praying for themselves and for each other; the Lord being their Guide, they would walk by the rivers of waters, every obstacle being removed, and their way made plain before them: for God would avow himself the Father of all Israel; and even Ephraim, who seemed quite cast off, should inherit as his first-born. —The return of a few Israelites with the Jews, after the captivity, cannot come up to the full meaning of these predictions, nor can any other gathering of Israel to their own land. They seem figuratively to describe the conversion of sinners to Christ; their helpless condition in themselves; the burdens and distresses under which they labour; the repentance and prayer with which they come; the comforts and assistance which they derive from their tender Guide and Shepherd; the plain and safe way in which they are led; and their adoption as children and heirs o the Lord almighty. But there is abundant reason to conclude, that they also predict a future gathering of the Israelites to Christ, from all the quarters of the globe. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10—14. The same subject is here enlarged on. Let all the distant nations hear that JEHOVAH, who scattered Israel, would gather him again into his Church, as a shepherd doth his flock into his fold. By breaking the power of the Assyrians and Chaldeans, he redeemed Jacob from enemies stronger than he; by breaking the yoke of Satan, he redeems the true Israel from this potent enemy: and by crushing the power of antichrist, he will deliver his Church, and make way for the conversion of both Jews and Gentiles. The return of the Jews to mount Zion with songs of praise, and their flowing together to enjoy the goodness of the Lord, and to thank him for their plenty and prosperity; with the revival of religion, and the holy joy which showed itself among them, after the building of the city and temple, and was manifested in varied expressions, by all orders and ranks of the people, were emblems of the abundant holiness, privileges, and comforts, reserved for the Church in those happy times that are approaching.

V. 15—17. The original name of Rachel is exactly the same as in Genesis; though in our bibles it is generally printed Rahel. As this in some degree perplexes many readers, Rachel is substituted in the text, as well as in the notes. Rachel was mother to Joseph and Benjamin: from the former descended a large proportion of the kingdom of Israel, and from the other numbers of the inhabitants of Jerusalem. The desolations of Israel and Judah made vast havoc amongst her descendants. The sepulchre of Rachel was betwixt Ramah and Bethlehem: and she is here poetically introduced as weeping for her children with bitter and inconsolable lamentation, as if her posterity had been utterly extirpated. It will hereafter be considered in what sense the murder of the children in the coasts of Bethlehem accomplished this prediction. (Notes, Matt. ii. 17, 18.) To carry on the allusion, the Lord here addresses her, and calls on her to refrain from weeping, for her labour in bringing up her children should not be lost, or be without recompense; as those that were left, and scattered among their enemies, would come again to their own land; and she might hope for great blessings for them in the latter days.

V. 18—20. All the blessings predicted to Israel, implied that he would be brought to repentance. This is here more particularly described, in the person of Ephraim, as representing the nation. The Lord heard him under his afflictions, bemoaning himself with penitent confessions and prayers. He looks back, and recollects with grief and shame, that the Lord had chastised him, and that he had suffered without deriving benefit; or at length he had received instruction, though he had long been refractory and rebellious, as headstrong bullocks, not inured to the yoke, which struggle against the driver, and will not submit.—Conscious that this is the nature of his proud stout heart, and that it must be humbled, softened, and converted; and that he cannot effect this change by his own power; he believes that God can, hopes that he will, and prays that he would, "turn him, that he may be turned." He acknowledges, that the Lord has a right to his obedience and service, and that he stands in a peculiar relation to him, and he desires to have him for his God and Portion. Some little of this gracious turning he experiences; he had begun to repent of his sins: and since he had been instructed in the things of God, he was sensible of his guilt and danger, and was full of self-indignation and abhorrence, to think how rebellious and ungrateful he had been; which astonishment and self-displacency he expressed by smiting on his thigh. He was grieved and confounded to find that he lay under a heavy load of deserved ignominy and reproach, for the sins that he had been committing from his youth, which deserved more than all the contempt and misery that he lay under. The Lord seeing Ephraim, like the prodigal son, thus "come to himself," and overwhelmed with sorrow and shame, speaks of him with the tenderest affection. Could this poor distressed mourner be Ephraim, his dear son, his child in whom he had so delighted? And was he at length returned home again? Let him not be upbraided with his offences, of which he so deeply repented; but let him be re-admitted to all the privileges of a child, without limitation or delay. For ever since that the Lord denounced sentence against him, or addressed him with cutting rebukes, he had remembered him with tender compassion, and earnest longings after him; as an affectionate parent doth his son, whom he is obliged to correct. His eye was upon him through all his wanderings, waiting to be gracious: and as he was now truly penitent, and supplicated mercy, he would surely extend it to him. 'Do thou turn my heart 'by thy preventing grace, and thus I shall be effectually 'reformed. As soon as God's grace touched my heart, 'and gave me a due sense of my duty, and the many 'deviations from it I had been guilty of, I straightway 'became a true penitent; and expressed my repentance by 'all the outward and inward signs of an unfeigned sorrow. '—The burden of my former sins lay heavy on my mind; 'and I became sensible, that all the calamities and re-

[s] proaches I had undergone were the due desert of mine [s] offences.' (Lowth.)—This is a most instructive and encouraging representation of the nature and effects of true repentance; and its prophetic meaning may either relate to the conversion of Israelites to Christianity in the primitive times, or to events yet in futurity.

V. 21, 22. The dispersed Jews and Israelites are here called on to return without delay to their deserted cities, and to set up way-marks, or to throw up heaps to direct inquirers in the road. Let them heartily attempt to go back to their own land, by the way in which they had gone from it, and no longer wander about as they had done; like a woman who had improperly left her father's house, and was afraid or ashamed, or reluctant to return. To encourage them to this, the Lord assures them, that "he "had created," or would create, "a new thing in the "earth." It would be a new thing, altogether unprecedented, and worthy to be called a creation; for "A woman "should compass a man," or a Mighty one, a great Deliverer. Now what can this more properly mean, than that a virgin, continuing so, should conceive and compass in her womb, and bear a son, who would be "that Seed of the "woman, who was appointed to "bruise the serpent's "head; even EMMANUEL, God with us?" This was effected by the immediate power of God, contrary to the established course of nature: it was a new thing, both as to his miraculous conception and his mysterious person: and it was adduced with great propriety for the encouragement of the Jews to return to that land, where this promised Deliverer was to arise.—'As it is a new thing, and 'unheard of, that a woman should court a man; so God 'will bring as strange a thing to pass, that the Jewish 'nation shall return to God, their Husband. So most of 'the modern Jews, and some of the Christian expositors, 'understand the words: A woman, that is, the most 'feeble despicable persons, compared elsewhere to women, 'should discomfit a mighty warrior.' (Lowth.) These are the most plausible interpretations given of the passage, by those who reject that which is stated above. But the narrative of Potiphar's wife, and that of Jael and Sisera, and very many others, suffice to show, that neither of these were new things on earth: and surely the solemnity of the introduction, and the term create, appear on either interpretation, to have little propriety or meaning. 'One that 'is only a woman, and not a wife, namely, a virgin, shall 'conceive in her womb a man-child, (Rev. xii. 5.) This 'is truly a new thing, never before related or heard of: 'without which satisfaction could not be obtained by the 'weary soul, nor the new covenant be established, (31—34.) 'By this the backsliding daughter, namely, the nation of 'the Jews, which was turned away from God, ought to be 'so influenced as no longer to wander about, at a distance 'from him.' (Cocceius.) It is observable, that the other predictions of the miraculous conception are conveyed in an obscure manner, and have caused much difficulty to expositors, (Notes, Gen. iii. 15. Is. vii. 14:) and it seems exceedingly proper, that the clear and express declaration of such an event should be subsequent to its having actually taken place.——'Several ancient Jews expounded the 'text of the Messias.—And most Christian interpreters 'understand it of the miraculous conception.—Taking the 'words in this sense, they properly import a new creation, 'and such as is the immediate work of God. The coming 'of the Messias is the foundation of all the promises, both 'of the first and second covenant: and that covenant, of 'which Christ was to be the Mediator, is plainly foretold 'and described.' (31—34.) (Lowth.)

V. 23—26. After the desolations of Judah, Jerusalem, and the temple, which had been called the habitation of justice and the mountain of holiness, prayers for their prosperity were discouraged: but the suspension would be taken off by the restoration of them; and then such expressions of good-will to Zion would be frequent and fervent. For the Lord had purposed to satisfy and comfort every one, who was wearied with trials and sorry for his sins, or who sympathized in the sorrows of his afflicted people; and the outward blessings, to which he meant to restore them, would be typical of the spiritual prosperity of the gospel-church. This seems to have been presented before the prophet's mind in a dream or vision: and when he awaked and considered it, he was refreshed with the pleasing prospect, so contrary to the visions that he had generally seen.—'Having seen this vision of the Messiah to come, in whom the 'two houses of Israel and Judah should be joined, I rejoiced.'

throw down, and to destroy, and to afflict; [i] so will I watch over them, to build, and to plant, saith the LORD.

30 But [l] every one shall die for his own iniquity: every man that eateth the sour grape, his teeth shall be set on edge.

31 ¶ Behold, [m] the days come, saith the LORD, that [n] I will make a new covenant [o] with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah:

32 [p] Not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers, [q] in the day that I took them by the hand to bring them out of the land of Egypt; [r] which my covenant they brake, * although I was an Husband unto them, saith the LORD:

33 But [s] this shall be the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel; After those days, saith the LORD, [t] I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts; [u] and will be their God, and they shall be my people.

34 And they shall [x] teach no more every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, saying, [y] Know the LORD: [z] for they shall all know me, from the least of them unto the greatest of them, saith the LORD: [a] for I will forgive their iniquity, and I will remember their sin no more.

V. 27, 28. (Marg. Ref.) 'I will show the same 'care and vigilance (xliv. 27.) in restoring them, as I 'have formerly done in destroying them.' (Lowth.) Some understand the passage of the replenishing of the Church by numerous converts; and establishing it in peace and prosperity.

V. 29, 30. (Notes, Ez. xviii.) (Marg. Ref.) The people thought it hard, that they should suffer for the sins of their fathers, (though it was evident that they imitated and exceeded them, and thus filled up the measure of their iniquities:) and they expressed their murmurs by a proverb, stating that the children's teeth were set on edge, or put to pain, by the fathers eating sour grapes. But the Lord assures them, that in the happy days here predicted they should neither have occasion, nor disposition, thus to reflect on the equity of his dealings. 'But should willingly 'acknowledge, that every one of them had smarted for 'his own iniquity; and had sins enow of his own, to war- 'rant God's proceedings against him.' (Bp. Hall.)—When Christ came, all who believed on him, separated from their unbelieving countrymen, and escaped their national calamities. 'This will be remarkably verified, 'when God shall cease to visit on the Jewish nation the 'imprecation which they laid on themselves by the death 'of Christ; "His blood be upon us and on our children." (Lowth.)

V. 31—34. The national covenant, made at Sinai with Israel when brought out of Egypt, is here contrasted with "the new covenant." Notwithstanding the tender and compassionate care of JEHOVAH to Israel at that time, when he espoused the nation to himself, they proved unfaithful, and brake the covenant by apostacy, idolatry, and iniquity: and at length, rejecting the Messias, they were cast out of the Church, and expelled from the promised land. This covenant was distinct both from the covenant of works, of which Adam was the surety, and under which every unbeliever in every age and nation is found; and from the covenant of grace, mediated by Christ, of which every believing Israelite received the blessing. This promise of a new covenant, as St. Paul has shown, implied the abrogation of the Mosaic law, and the introduction of another and more spiritual dispensation. (Note, Heb. viii.)

—I was an husband, &c. This clause is rendered in the Septuagint, "I regarded them not." St. Paul follows that version in this respect, though he varies from it in several parts of his quotation. Some think the original may admit of this translation; but it does not seem the obvious meaning. 'God will deal with them with that 'grace and favour, as if they had never offended him; and 'will set forth Christ to be a full, perfect, and sufficient 'Sacrifice and Propitiation for the sins of all that truly 'repent and turn to him. God will now give a great- 'er measure of his grace, both to instruct men in the 'knowledge of his will, and to engage them to practise 'accordingly.' (Lowth.) Israel as a nation typified the true people of God: the old covenant made with them, as typical of the new covenant made with all true believers, as one with Christ. This is not ratified with a nation as such, (though every Christian nation is under a dispensation of mercy, according to this covenant, in some things, as the Jews were;) but it is made with Christ the Surety, in behalf of his people, and with each of them personally, as by faith he becomes a member of his mystical body. The moral law was written in tables of stone, and in the book of the law, and put into the hands of the Israelites; but they brake it, for want of a spiritual mind, and thus it brought them under condemnation: but, according to the new covenant, God engages to put "it into the inward "parts, and to write it in the hearts" of his people. That is, by regenerating grace, he creates in them a judgment, disposition, and affections, congenial to the holy law of love: then they perceive its spirituality, reasonableness, and excellency; they "consent to it, that it is good;" they repent of breaking it; they see the nature, value, and glory of Christ's salvation, and accept of it; they hope for pardon, acceptance, and assistance, through him; and thus they learn to "delight in the law after the inward man," and to grieve and be humbled that they keep it so imperfectly. In this way the LORD becomes their God, and they his people, prepared for the daily exercise of repentance, faith, humble conscientious obedience, and the spiritual worship of him in his ordinances. It is not needful for persons of this character to call one another off from idols to the knowledge and worship of JEHOVAH; nor would they be left to mere human teaching: but the whole company, from the greatest to the least, have "an heart "given them so to know the LORD," (xxiv. 7.) as to trust in him and to cleave to his service: he absolves them from the guilt of all their sins, and will not remember them any more to their condemnation: and the law thus written in their hearts, with the knowledge of God thus communicated, preserves them from breaking the covenant, or again coming into condemnation, by relapsing into iniquity, and living and dying in impenitence and unbelief. So that it is the peculiar excellency of this covenant, that it provides against all those dangers which otherwise might deprive the persons interested in it of the covenanted blessings.—When Israel shall be again called into the Church, it will not be according to the Sinai covenant; but by having the law written in their hearts, and the covenant thus inwardly ratified to them. (Notes, Heb. viii. 7—13. x. 16—18.)

V. 36, 37. As surely as the heavenly bodies will continue their settled course, to the end of time; so surely will the Lord have a Church on earth; nay, so surely will Israel be continued a separate people, without being finally excluded from the Church: nor will God ever cast them all off for all their sins; till it be possible for man to measure the height of the heavens, or to search out the foundations of the earth.

V. 38—40. The rebuilding of Jerusalem after the captivity seems to be here predicted, as an earnest of all the other promised mercies. At present we know little of several of the places here mentioned; (Marg. Ref.) But the conclusion seems to intimate, that the Spirit of prophecy either meant figuratively to predict the building of the spiritual Jerusalem, or to foretel some future events, which cannot now be specified.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—14.

The greatest blessing which we can desire for our families is, that the LORD may be their God: and if we devote them to him, and bring them up for him, we may expect that this will be their felicity. When he commissions the sword to waste the nations where his name is known, he reserves a remnant to whom he will be gracious; and often those judgments, which sweep numbers of hypocrites and ungodly men into perdition, make way for peculiar blessings to their survivors, or posterity. If we find grace with God, he will lead us through all the perils and difficulties of this wilderness, and cause us to rest in his salvation. All the discoveries that he hath made of himself to fallen man, and all his marvellous works for his Church, have sprung from his everlasting and unchangeable love. This induced him to form the glorious plan of salvation, and first to promise, and then to give his beloved Son to be the sacrifice for our sins: and this also moved him to draw us by his grace and allure us by his loving kindness, to come unto him, and seek a share in the purchased blessings; and having been thus drawn to seek communion with him and conformity to him, we shall for ever enjoy the fruits of his special favour. From the same endearing principle JEHOVAH is led to build up the walls of Jerusalem, and to turn the mournings of his people over her desolations into songs of triumphant praises for her renewed prosperity. They should bless the name of our God, whom he hath placed near to his watchmen, who watch for their souls, and who excite and exhort sinners to arise and go up to Zion to the Lord our God. Such as are called to this work should be vigilant, faithful, and earnest; they ought themselves first to arise and lead the way by their example, "walking in all God's ordi-"nances and commandments blameless:" they should endeavour to terminate those unhappy differences, which, as it were, set the tribes of Israel at variance: and all Christians should pray that many such watchmen may be raised up, and sent forth in every place; and especially to call the ancient people of God to rejoin his Church and share her privileges. The chief of the nations, and Britain especially, (which seems to be rendered pre-eminent in commerce and navigation for that very purpose,) should celebrate with gladness the wondrous works of God for Jacob, in the great Redeemer raised up among that people; and should publish these glad tidings to all around, with praise and gratitude, that they may spread from shore to

CHAP. XXXII.

Jeremiah imprisoned for predicting the destruction of Jerusalem and the captivity of Zedekiah, 1—5. He buys a field by the command of God, as a token that the Jews should be restored to their inheritances, 6—15. He prays to be further certified concerning these transactions, 16—25. He is informed of the approaching calamities for the sins of the people, 26—35; and encouraged by promises of spiritual and temporal blessings, 36—44.

shore, till the utmost coasts of the earth are made acquainted with the joyful sound: nor should we forget to join our prayers with our endeavours, that the Lord may save his people, even the remnant of Israel. When his time arrives, his power and grace can readily remove all obstacles, rectify all obliquities, and remedy all defects: he can give eyes to the blind, and feet to the lame, strength to the weak, support to the heavy laden, and rest to the weary soul; and thus bring great companies into his Church. When he effectually draws sinners to come to him, their hard hearts soon melt and soften; and they, who once were too proud and stout to attend to such duties, and who derided those that did, learn to mourn for sin and cry for mercy. Then he will lead them in his ways, supply their wants, refresh and comfort their hearts, uphold them from falling, and be a Father unto them, and they shall be his children and his heirs. It shall be known even to the isles afar off, that he careth for his chosen people: and if he suffer them to be scattered, he will gather and keep them, as a shepherd doth his flock: by price and by power he hath ransomed and redeemed them from those enemies that were stronger than they; and he will maintain and perfect their deliverance, and not let any pluck them out of his hand. To his courts they flow together, to share and to celebrate his goodness: and whilst he supplies all their outward wants, their souls shall be cheerful and fruitful as a watered garden. Their sorrows shall terminate in joy; and their comforts are earnests of eternal felicity in that world, where they shall not sorrow any more at all, but both ministers and people shall be satisfied with the goodness of the Lord.

V. 15—30.

Whilst the believer hath "a joy that a stranger inter-
"meddleth not with;" he must in the world expect tribulations: and a voice of lamentation often interrupts that of thanksgiving, even in the dwellings of the righteous. But if bereaving providences, or other afflictions, cause the Christian such bitter mourning, that he refuses to be comforted, it must be considered as his infirmity. We should not mourn over our children and relatives, as if they were not, when they are removed from us: but, having used the proper means for promoting their future felicity, we should leave them with our righteous and merciful God. He graciously comforts those that are cast down, and bids his mourners dry their tears; for both their sorrows and labours shall be recompensed: and if we have hope in our end for ourselves and those belonging to us, concerning an eternal inheritance, all temporal afflictions will be tolerable. —The true penitent reflects with shame and contrition on his former obstinacy and rebellion, and on his misconduct under afflictions, as well as his abuse of mercies: he knows that he hath often suffered in vain, and hath been as untractable as the "bullock unaccustomed to the yoke." Once he excused his sins; but now he is sensible of his ingratitude and folly: he is convinced that he must be made a new creature, in order to serve God and enjoy his favour; he feels the power of inbred sin, evil habits, and strong temptations, and perceives that he cannot new-create his own heart: thus he learns to value the promises of sanctifying grace, and to plead them in prayer, crying to the Lord, "Turn thou me, and I shall be turned;" 'Convert 'me, or I shall never be converted.' His prayers will be answered, he will be more and more abased and humbled; and increasing instruction will lead him to abhor himself, and to remember with shame the sins that were the reproach of his youth, and the effects of which he hath perhaps still to struggle with. This may, or may not, be accompanied with terror: but it will surely be attended with submission to the justice of God in all his corrections and threatenings, an entire reliance on his mercy and grace, and newness of life. Where this change is effected, (whether in the case of a new convert, or of a returning backslider,) the Lord will treat him as a beloved child in whom he greatly delighteth, and "will surely have mercy "on him;" he will pity his sorrows and terrors, as a father doth those of his son whom he loveth and correcteth; and will remember him with the most tender compassions. He is of his own clemency disposed to this kindness; and in that new thing, that he hath created on earth, in the Virgin's Son, the glorious Prince of Peace, the great Emmanuel, he hath made way for the honourable exercise of his mercy to the chief of sinners. Let then poor prodigals, who are come to themselves, no longer wander about, as ashamed or afraid to return to their Father's house: let them set their hearts to the highway which he hath cast up; let them "return to the LORD," and he will have mercy on them; and then let them direct and encourage others in the same salutary course. Thus men return to Zion, and are enrolled her citizens: and all who profess to worship our God in Christ, and on his mercy-seat, should remember that his Church is "the ha"bitation of righteousness and the mountain of holiness:" as such, they should still pray for her prosperity, and that they may be a credit and ornament to her by their holy examples. He hath yet a remnant both of pastors and of flocks, who answer this description; and he still continues to satiate the weary, and replenish the sorrowful soul. Having tasted his grace, hoping for his glory, and looking forward to the happy event of all our troubles and those of the whole family of Christ, our thoughts even in death may be pleasant, by reflecting on what we shall shortly awake to behold and enjoy. For the Lord will still watch over his people and purify his Church. No man shall finally perish, but for his own sins; nor any sinner, who is willing to accept of Christ's salvation.

THE word that came to Jeremiah from the LORD [a] in the tenth year of Zedekiah king of Judah, which was [b] the eighteenth year of Nebuchadrezzar.

2 For then the king of Babylon's army besieged Jerusalem: and [c] Jeremiah the prophet was shut up in the court of the prison, which was in the king of Judah's house.

3 For [d] Zedekiah king of Judah had shut him up, saying, [e] Wherefore dost thou prophesy, and say, Thus saith the LORD; [f] Behold, I will give this city into the hand of the king of Babylon, and he shall take it;

4 And [g] Zedekiah king of Judah shall not escape out of the hand of the Chaldeans, but shall surely be delivered into the hand of the king of Babylon, and shall speak with him mouth to mouth, and his eyes shall behold his eyes;

5 And he shall lead Zedekiah to Babylon, and there shall he be [h] until I visit him, saith the LORD; [i] though ye fight with the Chaldeans, ye shall not prosper.

6 ¶ And Jeremiah said, The word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

7 Behold, Hanameel the son of Shallum thine uncle shall come unto thee, saying, Buy thee my field that is in [k] Anathoth: [l] for the right of redemption is thine to buy it.

8 So Hanameel mine uncle's son came to me [m] in the court of the prison, according to the word of the LORD, and said unto me, Buy my field, I pray thee, that is in Anathoth, which is in the country of Benjamin: for the right of inheritance is thine, and the redemption is thine; buy it for thyself. [n] Then I knew that this was the word of the LORD.

9 And I bought the field of Hanameel my uncle's son, that was in Anathoth, and weighed him the money, even * seventeen shekels of silver.

10 And I † subscribed the evidence, and sealed it, and took witnesses, [o] and weighed him the money in the balances.

11 So I took the evidence of the purchase, both that which was sealed [p] according to the law and custom, and that which was open.

12 And I gave the evidence of the purchase unto [q] Baruch the son of Neriah, the son of Maaseiah, in the sight of Hanameel mine uncle's son, [r] and in the presence of the witnesses that subscribed the book of the purchase, before all the Jews that sat in the court of the prison.

13 And I charged Baruch before them, saying,

14 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Take these evidences, this evidence of the purchase, both which Blessed be God for his new covenant, and for that new dispensation under which we live! But let us not trust to the outward administration of it, which will stand us in no more stead than the Sinai-covenant did Israel, except the law be written in our hearts, as the principle of genuine repentance, faith, and cheerful obedience. This alone can prove that we are the true people of God: and that we know the Father and the Son, by the teaching of the Holy Spirit, and that all our sins are blotted out, to be remembered no more for ever. This circumcision and regeneration of the heart seals to the Christian the righteousness of faith, and evidences that he is Christ's, and has peace with God through him: and the power that formed the heavenly orbs, and continues them for lights to the earth, and that divideth the sea when the waves thereof roar, will keep him through faith unto salvation. The personal happiness of every true believer is secured by that promise, covenant, and oath, which assure us that the gates of hell shall not prevail against the Church. This his love is immeasurable, and passeth knowledge; it can only be apprehended by faith and experience: and to those who thus apprehend it, every present mercy is a pledge and earnest of his complete and eternal salvation.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXII. V. 2. Jeremiah was confined, to prevent his publicly delivering his predictions: but it does not appear that he was put to further hardship at this time, or that his friends were excluded from him. Zedekiah and his princes were desperately resolved to hold out to the last extremity, not only against the superior power of the Chaldeans, but in defiance of the word of God: and Jeremiah must be silenced, or he would discourage the people by his predictions.

15 For thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; [s] Houses, and fields, and vineyards, shall be possessed again in this land.

16 ¶ Now when I had delivered the evidence of the purchase unto Baruch the son of Neriah, [t] I prayed unto the LORD, saying,

17 [u] Ah Lord GOD! behold, [x] thou hast made the heaven and the earth, by thy great power and stretched-out arm, and [y] there is nothing * too hard for thee:

19 Great [c] in counsel, and mighty in † work: [d] for thine eyes are open upon all the ways of the sons of men: [e] to give every one according to his ways, and according to the fruit of his doings:

20 Which [f] hast set signs and wonders in the land of Egypt, even unto this day, and in Israel, and among other men; [g] and hast made thee a name, as at this day;

21 And hast [h] brought forth thy people Israel out of the land of Egypt, with signs, and with wonders, and [i] with a strong hand, and with a stretched-out arm, and with great terror;

22 And hast given them this land, [k] which thou didst swear to their fathers to give them, [l] a land flowing with milk and honey;

23 And they came in, [m] and possessed it, [n] but they obeyed not thy voice, neither walked in thy law; they have done nothing of all that thou commandedst them to do: [o] therefore thou hast caused all this evil to come upon them.

24 Behold the ‡ mounts, they are come unto the city to take it; and [p] the city is given into the hand of the Chaldeans that fight against it, [q] because of the sword, and of the famine, and of the pestilence: and [r] what thou hast spoken is come to pass: and, behold, thou seest it.

V. 6—15. The prophet was assured that the city and temple would soon be levelled with the ground; and all the rest of the land was at that time in the possession of the Chaldeans: yet the Lord made it known to him, that his cousin would come to him to sell him a field; and as he was the next in succession, to whom the right of redemption belonged, he commanded him to purchase it. Accordingly Hanameel came on this business. During the famine that prevailed in the city, he probably wanted money to buy bread, and his field would not be thought of much value in such circumstances; which may account for the stipulated sum being so small, for probably it was not more than forty shillings. It does not concern us to inquire, whether this land were a part of the possessions of the priests, in the suburbs of Anathoth, or some other small estate in the neighbourhood, that had come into the family: for the thing signified, not the sign, was chiefly to be noticed. The prophet himself was not likely to have any advantage from the field, nor any relation that was nearer to him than Hanameel himself; and it might be very inconvenient to him to part even with so small a sum, in his difficult circumstances: but he knew that it was the word of the LORD, and implicitly obeyed it. By remaining unmarried, (xvi.) he assured the people, that he was satisfied of the truth of his predictions respecting the captivity; and by thus buying the field he proved the same, as to his predictions of their restoration. The transaction being settled, according to the law and custom of the time, with great punctuality, would give it notoriety: and his orders to his companion Baruch to put the deeds into an earthen vessel, (an apt emblem of the precariousness of such possessions,) and to secure them in some place where they might be found at the end of many days, would cause the annexed reason to be the more noticed and remembered.

V. 17. Hard, &c. Or 'hidden from thee, out of the 'reach of thy wisdom to compass.' (Lowth.) (*Marg. (Gen. xviii. 14. Judg. xiii. 18. Marg. Is. ix. 6.) The prophet seems to have been greatly surprised, at comparing the command just given with the dispensations of Providence. The whole appeared wonderful to him: but he knew that it was not so before God; because "known unto him are "all his works from the beginning of the world;" and "He worketh all things after the counsel of his own "will." This therefore seems to have implied a petition for some further satisfaction on the subject.

V. 24. Mounts. 'The word signifieth any thing that 'is cast up, as a mount or a rampart; and is also used for 'engines of war, which were laid on a high place, to 'shoot into a city, before the invention of guns.'

V. 25. Or rather "Although the city, &c." The prophet seems to have been greatly perplexed when he reflected on this transaction. Perhaps he yet indulged a hope, that the city might be spared; or he feared, that the people would put this construction on his conduct. But having stayed his mind on the perfections of God, and on his sovereignty and wondrous works for Israel, and expressed himself as one assured that he was righteous in all his judgments, he concluded with intimating his difficulties; there was every appearance, that the Chaldeans would speedily succeed in their attempt; yet the Lord ordered him to buy the field, with great exactness about the witnesses and the deeds, though the city was given into the hand of their enemies. And what could be the design of such orders?

V. 27. (Marg. Ref.) "The God of all flesh," or of all men; the Creator, Ruler, and Judge of other nations, as well as Israel, could easily have rescued the city from the Chaldeans, had he seen good: and he could as easily restore it from its ruins. He employed the Chaldeans to inflict his judgments on the Jews; and he would employ the Medes and Persians to execute vengeance on Babylon, to give liberty to his people, and to enable them to rebuild the temple and Jerusalem. (Note, 17.)

V. 28—30. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 31. Jerusalem, or Salem, was built not very long after the deluge. (Note, Gen. xiv. 18—20.) But when David took the city of Zion, he so improved and enlarged Jerusalem, in order that it might be the capital of his kingdom, and the centre of Israel's worship, that he may be considered as the builder of it. He intended that it should be "the holy city;" and in external privileges it was so: but even during his life time many abominations were there committed: and no sooner had Solomon completed his father's designs, than the holy and "faithful city "became an harlot:" and continued to be the scene of the grossest idolatries, with little intermission, till the Babylonish captivity.

V. 32—35. (Marg. Ref.)

To cause, &c. The idolatrous kings, princes, and priests, and the false prophets, by their authority, influence, example, menaces, reasonings, and persuasions, "caused "Judah to sin;" that is, they proved successful tempters to the people in general.

fulfilled before their eyes: so they seem to have been equally incredulous respecting its future restoration, and generally given up to sullen despondency.

V. 37. (Marg. Ref.) 'This promise, taken in its 'full extent, was not made good to those that returned 'from captivity; because they were frequently infested 'with wars, as well by the kings of Syria and Egypt, as 'by the rest of their neighbours; and were finally sub-'dued and destroyed by the Romans.' (Jerome in Lowth.)

V. 39—41. These verses might have some reference to the revival of religion, which took place after the captivity: but greater and more durable blessings were evidently intended. The introduction of the gospel-dispensation, the conversion of many of the Jews to Christ, their union with each other, and with the Gentile converts, in the worship of God, and perhaps the future conversion of the Jewish nation, must be implied in the prophetical meaning: but the character and privileges of all true Christians are also described. By regeneration the Lord gives them one heart, that is, one judgment and disposition. They often differ in things of inferior consequence, through remaining ignorance, sin, and temptation: but in the more important matters, which respect the divine character and perfections, the evil of sin, and the lost estate of fallen man; the way of salvation through the divine Saviour, and his merits and grace; the nature and excellency of holiness; their obligations to love and serve God; the vanity of the world, and the importance of eternal things; they are all of one mind and judgment. And they are all disposed to repentance, faith in Christ, and love to him and their brethren; to hate sin, and to worship and obey the Lord. Union and communion with God in Christ, and conformity to him, produce congeniality of spirit with each other: so that, as far as they are under the influence of divine grace, they are all of one heart and soul, and disposed to associate and worship together; as children of one family, soldiers of one army, or travellers in one journey. They have also all of them access to God, and acceptance with him in one Way, even through Jesus Christ; and they all habitually walk in the one way of holiness which he hath marked out to them. These blessings are conferred on them, that they may fear, reverence, worship, and obey God through life; and that a succession of such persons may be preserved on earth to the end of the world. This is for their present and future good, and for that of their children after them; who, being trained up under the ordinances of God, have vast advantages above others, and are generally made partakers of the same grace with their parents, when properly educated. With these persons God makes an everlasting covenant, and secures to them the enjoyment of the promised blessings. He engages never to turn away from them, so as to cease to do them good; and to prevent the effects of their own inconstancy and depravity, by putting his fear into their hearts, that they may not depart from him. So that when love declines, and they grow unwatchful, or are tempted to sin; fear revives, they begin to tremble for the consequences, and are thus led to renewed repentance, faith, prayer, watchfulness, and obedience. Thus they cannot forfeit the promised blessings; for the Lord engages for their part in the covenant, as well as for his own: and he will assuredly "rejoice over them to do them good, with "his whole heart and soul," for the glory of his name; and will bring them to heaven, even as he restored the captive Jews to the land of Canaan. As nothing like such an unchangeable covenant was made with the Jews after the captivity, we must needs have recourse to a more spiritual and evangelical meaning, in explaining the prophecy. (Note, xxxi. 31—34.)

Plant. The re-establishment of Israel and Judah in Canaan, and their union as one nation, after conversion to Christ, is here, as well as in many other places, most clearly and emphatically predicted.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—25.

The judgments of God often come gradually upon sinners; but always without fail, when not prevented by timely repentance. They who harden their hearts against the warnings of his word, will hate and persecute those that faithfully declare them. But if God be for us, we need not fear the power of any adversary: and they who fight against him, can never prosper in resisting the executioners of his vengeance. Ministers should in their whole conduct exhibit an example of implicit obedience, and evince that they really believe the doctrines which they teach to others: they should appear disinterested, and attentive to every relative duty: and though they must not entangle themselves in the affairs of this life, yet, in needful secular concerns, they should act with punctuality and exactness, avoiding all appearance of evil, and precluding, as far as possible, all occasions of contention to survivors. —Earthly inheritances are never of very great value: but in times of great public calamities, and in the hour of death, they begin to appear in their real insignificancy: and in the same interesting seasons men begin to form a more proper estimate of the value of an inheritance in heaven. This consideration should direct our habitual judgment and conduct. Whatever creates perplexity should lead us to the throne of grace: and though we must not hesitate to obey God, when we do not perceive the reasons of his commandments, yet we should seek increasing light, that our obedience may be more intelligent. When we cannot understand any particular providential dispensations, we may profitably recur to first and general principles. We are sure that nothing can be too hard for the Creator of the world, that the Judge of all the earth will do right, and that the Saviour of sinners cannot be defective in goodness and mercy. If then the Lord recompense the iniquities of the fathers into the bosom of their children after them, we may be sure that it consists with his justice: and if he suffer his people to be afflicted by their enemies, it must be the result of his wisdom, truth, and mercy. Whatever he promises or threatens he can easily effect: for "he is great in council, and mighty in operation; and "his eyes are open upon all the ways of the sons of men, "to give to every one according to his doings." The works that he hath wrought for the salvation of his people and the ruin of his enemies, and to make his name glorious, should be considered as so many specimens of his general conduct, and demonstrations that he will perform his whole word. Alas, how many are there, who enjoy his providential bounties and the means of grace in abundance, who will not obey his voice; nay, will do nothing of all that he hath commanded them to do! Therefore evil comes upon them: and while suffering the punishment of their sins, they will remember that "thus it was written, "and thus it must be."

V. 26—44.

When we have meditated with prayer and praise on the divine perfections and conduct, and have referred to him those things that have troubled us, we shall frequently find our minds composed and satisfied, even before we have received a solution of our difficulties: and the Lord will make known to his people his will, as far as their duty and peace are concerned. But he is of one mind, and his purposes are irreversible: he will relax nothing of his requirements, nor at all mitigate the sentence denounced against the impenitent. When the authority, influence, or example of ungodly men causes others to commit abomination; and when peculiar advantages for instruction are neglected and abused, the wrath of God will burn fiercely against the transgressors. But though the misconduct of vast multitudes has from the beginning made his visible Church a provocation of his anger, he will not forsake it: but, having destroyed the rebels from among his chosen remnant, he will gather them from all places into his fold, and cause them to dwell safely. To those who are indeed his people, and who have the Lord for their God, he giveth "one heart and one way," that they may be like minded with himself and each other; their filial fear and reverential worship does not mar the exercise of their grateful love and joy, but concurs in producing active and watchful obedience: this is as much for their good as for his glory, and entails the most valuable blessings on their posterity. Let us seek an interest in these precious promises, and rest in nothing short of them: let us remember that unity of heart and worship among Christians comes from the Spirit of God; and discord from sin and Satan: and let us "endeavour to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of "peace." Let us diligently seek the good of our children after us, and "bring them up in the nurture and admoni-"tion of the Lord." Let us earnestly come to Christ, and constantly use the means of grace: thus we shall know, that the everlasting covenant is made with us, and that the Lord will neither turn from us, nor leave us to depart from him. But it is his plan to preserve his people by putting his fear into their hearts: a confidence, therefore, that is never shaken by fear, even when disgraced by sin, is very suspicious; and some tender trembling Christians have better evidence of their safety, than they can be made to perceive. But we should be careful not to persuade men to a degree of confidence above their experience, diligence, conscientiousness, and simplicity: for this counteracts the Lord's plan. They who are interested in the covenant,

MOREOVER, the word of the LORD came unto Jeremiah the second time, while [a] he was yet shut up in the court of the prison, saying,

3 [c] Call unto me, and I will answer thee, and [d] shew thee great and † mighty things, which thou knowest not.

6 Behold, [h] I will bring it health and cure, and I will cure them, [i] and will reveal unto them the abundance of peace and truth.

7 And I [k] will cause the captivity of Judah and the captivity of Israel to return, [l] and will build them as at the first.

8 And [m] I will cleanse them from all their iniquity, whereby they have sinned against me; and I will pardon all their iniquities, whereby they have sinned, and whereby they have transgressed against me.

9 And it shall be to me [n] a name of joy, a praise, and an honour before all the nations of the earth, which shall hear all the good that I do unto them: and they shall [o] fear and tremble for all the goodness, and for all the prosperity that I procure unto it.

10 Thus saith the LORD; Again there shall be heard in this place, ([p] which ye say shall be desolate without man and without beast, even in the cities of Judah, and in the streets of Jerusalem, that are desolate, without man, and without inhabitant, and without beast,)

11 The [q] voice of joy, and the voice of gladness, the voice of the bridegroom, and the voice of the bride, [r] the voice of them that shall say, [s] Praise the LORD of hosts; for the LORD is good; for his mercy endureth for ever: and of them that shall bring [t] the sacrifice of praise into the house of the LORD. will in due time have the comfort of it. The Lord will "rejoice over them to do them good;" he will delight that "nothing is too hard for him," and that he can make the objects of his love as happy as he pleases: and he will never leave them nor forsake them, till he has planted them in his courts above, with his whole heart and soul. Let us then bear up under our trials, assured that we shall obtain all the good that he hath promised us; and far beyond our highest conceptions of it.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXIII. V. 2. Maker. This may either refer to the creation and establishment of the earth; or to the formation and establishment of the Church, of which Jerusalem was a type. The Lord had formed and established that holy city, and he would renew his mercies to her.

V. 3. Jeremiah had prayed, and in answer to his prayers had received gracious intimations of manifold blessings in reserve for Israel: he was therefore encouraged still to call on the LORD, who promised to reveal to him yet more glorious things, which hitherto he had not been acquainted with, or but partially. The verse may, however, be understood as an encouragement to the Church to call upon God, for the blessings afterwards predicted.

V. 4. Mounts, &c. Either battering rams, or engines from which to throw stones. (Note, xxxi. 24.)

V. 5. The allies who came to assist the Jews, or the Jews themselves, effected nothing by resisting the Chaldeans, except the prolongation and increase of their miseries: whilst their houses were filled with the dead bodies of such as the Lord slew by famine, pestilence, and the sword.

V. 6—9. All human efforts, to close the wounds and heal the maladies of Zion, made them worse: but in due time the Lord intended to apply effectual remedies to them; to re-establish her civil and ecclesiastical state, and to make known to her inhabitants the abundance of his mercy in being reconciled to them, the abundance of peace and prosperity to be found in his service, and the abundance of his truth in performing his promises. For he meant to cleanse them from both the guilt and pollution of their sins: and then they would be an accepted, holy, and happy people, in whom he would delight, and be glorified in the sight of the nations; who would be filled with astonishment and consternation, lest the power that had so prospered the Jews, should punish them for their enmity and injuries against them. (Notes, Esth. vi. 11—13.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11. (Marg. Ref.) The mention, (in the midst of the dire calamities to which the Jews were at this time subjected,) of that joyful song of praise, which was used to express the lively gratitude and admiring love of the 14 ¶ Behold, [a] the days come, saith the LORD, that I will [b] perform that good thing, which I have promised unto the house of Israel, and to the house of Judah.

15 In those days, [c] and at that time, will I cause the Branch of righteousness to grow up unto David; [d] and he shall execute judgment and righteousness in the land.

16 In those days [e] shall Judah be saved, and Jerusalem shall dwell safely: and this is the name wherewith she shall be called, * The LORD our righteousness.

18 Neither [g] shall the priests the Levites want a man before me to offer burnt-offerings, and to kindle meat-offerings, and to do sacrifice continually.

19 ¶ And the word of the LORD came unto Jeremiah, saying,

20 Thus saith the LORD; [h] If ye can break my covenant of the day, and my covenant of the night, and that there should not be day and night in their season;

21 Then [i] may also my covenant be broken with David my servant, [k] that he should not have a son to reign upon his throne; [l] and with the Levites the priests, my ministers.

22 As [m] the host of heaven cannot be numbered, neither the sand of the sea measured: [n] so will I multiply the seed of David my servant, and [o] the Levites that minister unto me.

23 ¶ Moreover, the word of the LORD came to Jeremiah, saying,

24 Considerest thou not what this people have spoken, saying, [p] The two families which the LORD hath chosen, he hath even cast them off? [q] Thus they have despised my people, that they should be no more a nation before them.

25 Thus saith the LORD; [r] If my covenant be not with day and night, [s] and if I have not appointed the ordinances of heaven and earth;

26 Then [t] will I cast away the seed of Jacob, and David my servant, so that I will not take any of his seed to be rulers over the seed of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: for [u] I will cause their captivity to return, [x] and have mercy on them.

most eminent saints, in the most prosperous times, is peculiarly striking; especially as connected with the joy expressed, during prosperity, in the common concerns of life, and showing, that these also would be conducted, with a hearty regard to the will and glory of God.—'Kimchi observes on this place; that none but eucharistical sacrifices shall be in use in the times of the Messiah.' (Lowth.)

V. 12, 13. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 14—16. (Note, xxiii. 5, 6.) In the passage referred to, "the LORD our righteousness" is given as the name of Christ; but here the Church is thus called. The privilege, in which above all other she glories, is, that JEHOVAH is her righteousness: and this is the peculiarity which distinguishes true believers from all other persons. The words, however, are more literally rendered in the old translation: "and he that shall call her "is the LORD our righteousness."

V. 17, 18. Christ is both the King and high priest of his Church: in him the covenant of royalty made with David and his seed, and that of priesthood made with Aaron and his seed and brethren, received their full completion: and all the sacrifices of that dispensation were superseded by his one oblation of himself, the efficacy of which remaineth for ever. But the continuance of a regular ministry amongst Christians, and the privileges of believers, who are a royal priesthood as united unto Christ, seem also to be predicted; and in this latter sense it is afterwards said, (22,) that the seed of David and the Levites would be multiplied as the sand of the sea.

V. 20—23. (Marg. Ref.) (Note, Gen. viii. 20—22.)

V. 24. Despised, &c. The Jews despised the privilege of being God's people, when they were driven out of Canaan for their sins; and the nations despised them, as if no more to be a people, but the Lord intended to restore them from their captivity, and to raise up Christ among them; and in both respects to perform the mercy promised to their fathers.

CHAP. XXXIV.

The prophet is sent to assure Zedekiah, that the city would be taken: and that he would be carried to Babylon, and there die in peace, 1—7. The princes and people, having covenanted to set free their enslaved brethren, again reduce them to bondage, 8—11. God by the prophet proclaims liberty to the sword, pestilence, and famine; and predicts the return and success of the Chaldeans, 12—22.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord more values, favours, and honours his faithful servants in a prison, than ungodly princes on their thrones, or hypocritical priests in the temple; and his presence and consolations can make any situation pleasant. He, that created and upholds the earth, forms and establishes the Church; and no power can prevail against him. All blessings must be sought by fervent prayer, which the Lord never fails to answer. The trembling sinner, when he begins to call upon God, soon begins to discover and experience such glory and blessedness, as before he could not have conceived. And as the believer continues to call on the Lord, he is led further and further in the same way, and finds, in every thing, that he is "able to do exceed-"ingly abundantly for him, above all that he can ask or "think." But when the saint shall arrive in heaven, what great, what glorious, what hidden things will be shown him, when he shall see the Lord as he is, be made like him, and know even as he is known! When sinners are suffering under divine corrections, or trembling for fear of the wrath to come, they only increase and prolong their miseries, by delaying to submit to God: but when they cast themselves unreservedly on his mercy, he brings health and cure to their souls, and reveals to them the abundance of his peace and truth. His sanctifying grace and pardoning mercy are inseparably connected: he certainly pardons all whom he cleanses; and cleanses all whom he pardons: "they who are thus washed, and sanctified, and justified, "in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our "God," are enabled to walk before him in peace and purity; and he takes pleasure in them, and is glorified by them, and in his goodness to them, before those that are without. Many are thus led to perceive a real difference betwixt the people of God, and the world around them; and to fear his wrath, for their enmity to those whom he delighteth to honour. Thus they tremble at the view of the prosperity and joy of believers, and are led to inquire after his salvation, and at length to partake of it; while in the same manner others are over-awed and kept from doing them further injury. Though the Lord will hide his face from his people for their sins; yet he will return to repair the desolations of his Church: and, notwithstanding interruptions, 'the voice of joy and thanksgiving shall be "heard in the dwellings of the righteous." Whilst they praise him for his everlasting mercy, they cannot but rejoice in him; and their sacrifices of praise are highly acceptable and honourable to him, when presented in the name of his beloved Son. Where he gives righteousness and peace, he will supply all temporal wants; and our relations and possessions will be comfortable to us, in proportion as they are sanctified by the word of God and prayer. When his time comes, he will perform every good thing that he hath promised to his Church: and as he fulfilled his word, in giving his Son to be the sacrifice for our sins and the Lord our Righteousness, who was emphatically "that good thing promised to the house of "Israel;" it would be the most inexcusable incredulity, to question the performance of any of his engagements. Through this our righteous King, who reigns on the throne of David, and is our High-priest upon his throne, let us bring our spiritual sacrifices, continually giving thanks to our God and Father by him. Let us pray, that the royal priesthood may be multiplied, as the sand of the sea: and in order to this, that able and faithful ministers may be sent forth into every place, to call sinners to the knowledge of salvation, and to excite his people to glorify God with their lips and in their lives. Whilst we value our privileges, as the people of God, let us not despise those families, which were of old his chosen, though for a time they seem to be cast off: for as he hath appointed the ordinances of heaven and earth, and the sun and moon know their appointed seasons; so surely will he cause their captivity to return, and have mercy on them. And as he, who rules over the whole spiritual seed of Abraham, sprang from that nation according to the flesh, he will deem his honour concerned in bringing them again into his Church, and restoring them to their former privileges.

5 But [g] thou shalt die in peace: and with the burnings of thy fathers, the former kings which were before thee, so shall they burn odours for thee; [h] and they will lament thee, saying, Ah, lord! for I have pronounced the word, saith the LORD.

6 Then Jeremiah the prophet [i] spake all these words unto Zedekiah king of Judah in Jerusalem,

7 When the king of Babylon's army fought [k] against Jerusalem, and against all the cities of Judah that were left, against [l] Lachish, and against Azekah; [m] for these defenced cities remained of the cities of Judah.

8 ¶ This is the word that came unto Jeremiah from the LORD, after that [n] the king Zedekiah had made a covenant with all the people which were at Jerusalem, [o] to proclaim liberty unto them;

9 That every man should let his man-servant, and every man his maid-servant, being an Hebrew or an Hebrewess, go free; that none should [p] serve himself of them, to wit, of a Jew his brother.

10 Now [q] when all the princes, and all the people, which had entered into the covenant, heard that every one should let his man-servant, and every one his maid-servant, go free, that none should serve themselves of them any more, then they obeyed, and let them go.

11 But [r] afterward they turned, and caused the servants and the hand-maids, whom they had let go free, to return, and brought them into subjection for servants and for handmaids.

12 Therefore the word of the LORD came to Jeremiah from the LORD, saying,

13 Thus saith the LORD, the God of Israel; [s] I made a covenant with your fathers, [t] in the day that I brought them forth out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondmen, saying,

14 At [u] the end of seven years let ye go every man his brother an Hebrew, which hath * been sold unto thee; and when he hath served thee six years, thou shalt let him go free from thee: [x] but your fathers hearkened not unto me, neither inclined their ear.

15 And [y] ye were † now turned, and had done right in my sight, in proclaiming liberty every man to his neighbour; [z] and ye had made a covenant before me,

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXIV. V. 2—5. (xxxii. 1—5.) Zedekiah was assured that he should be taken prisoner and carried captive, notwithstanding all his efforts to defend himself, or to escape by flight: but he was also informed that he should not be slain in battle, or die a violent death; but that he should die in peace according to the course of nature. Perhaps he was brought to repentance, and died at peace with God. It was, however, foretold that the Jews would show him the same respect which had been paid to other kings of Judah after their decease; and lament, that in his days the measure of their national iniquity was completed, and the family of David reduced so low; though he was not so desperately wicked as some of his predecessors had been. It is not known at what time Zedekiah died.

V. 8—11. (Notes, Exod. xxi. 2—6.) The Jews did not generally observe the divine law, in freeing their brethren who had become slaves, after they had served them seven years. But when Jerusalem was straitened by the Chaldeans, the king, perhaps excited by Jeremiah, entered into a solemn covenant with the people to set at liberty all their Hebrew slaves: and it was proclaimed that none of them, on any pretence, should thus illegally use the service of their brethren: accordingly the law was in this respect complied with. But when Pharaoh's army came out of Egypt to assist them, and the Chaldeans had left the siege of Jerusalem to go and meet them, thinking the danger was over, they impiously violated their solemn covenant, and with the most cruel injustice reduced to slavery the very persons to whom they had just before given freedom.

Princes. The verse may be thus translated, "All the "princes consented that every one should let his man-"servant go free: they consented, I say, and let them "go." (Lowth.)

V. 14. 'The seventh year was the year of release, '(Deut. xv. 9;) consequently servants were to continue in 'service but six years, and at the beginning of the seventh 'were to be made free.' Thus, "at the end of three 'years, thou shalt bring forth all the tithe, &c." "The "third year is the year of tithing." (Deut. xiv. 28. xxvi. 12.) 'So Christ is said to "rise again after three days," 'which is elsewhere explained by his rising on the third 'day.' (Lowth.) It is generally supposed that the slaves should have been set at liberty on each sabbatical year: but in that case many of them would have served far less than six years; and this is not expressly mentioned, either in the law of liberating slaves, or in that of keeping the sabbatical year. It is, however, likely that when no special reasons required the contrary, the observance of it was attended by giving liberty to slaves, as well as a release of insolvent debtors; and that the transaction here recorded was on a sabbatical year, though the calculations of learned men on that subject are not very satisfactory. (Marg. Ref.)

17 Therefore thus saith the LORD; Ye have not hearkened unto me, in proclaiming liberty every one to his brother, and every man to his neighbour: behold, [c] I proclaim a liberty for you, saith the LORD, [d] to the sword, to the pestilence, and to the famine; and [e] I will make you † to be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In the midst of wrath the Lord remembers mercy: and whatever calamities a sinner endures through life, or however he ends his days, if he dies at peace with God, he is highly favoured: and as faithful reproofs and severe corrections tend far more to this happy event, than flattery and prosperity; they are in themselves far preferable, though seldom chosen. The mercy of God to us should teach us mercy to our brethren; but they that despise his authority, commonly abuse their authority over others. Yet the Lord will severely punish even the greatest princes for oppressing their meanest slaves. Many things contained in the word of God are not known to his professed worshippers, which they will sometimes obey, when set before them: and this is one end and use of preaching.—When those in authority join example to their influence in promoting equity and humanity, they may effect great things in a little time: and this, as far as it goes, is doing right in the sight of God, who loveth righteousness and mercy. But when reformation springs only from terror and the prospect of imminent destruction, it is seldom durable. Many in such circumstances, seem very penitent, make hasty resolutions and solemn engagements, and "do many things;" but when the terror is subsided, they repent of their repentance, fall more entirely under the power of their sins, and seem in haste to undo the little good they had done. Solemn vows and sacramental engagements, thus entered into, only pollute the name and profane the ordinances of the Lord; and they, who are most forward to bind themselves by imprecations to perform their vows, are commonly most ready to violate them. But if men repent of their repentance, God will repent of his forbearance; "they shall have judgment without "mercy, who have showed no mercy;" and they, who will not obey God in their conduct towards those whom they have been used to oppress, will be cast out of his protection, and exposed to his temporal and eternal judgments. Let us then look to our hearts; that our repentance may be genuine, and that the law of loving God supremely, and our neighbour as ourselves, may be so written in our hearts, as to regulate our conduct in all our transactions.

THE word, which came unto Jeremiah from the LORD, [a] in the days of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah, saying,

2 Go unto [b] the house of the Rechabites, and speak unto them, and bring them into the house of the LORD, [c] into one of the chambers, and give them wine to drink.

3 Then I took Jaazaniah the son of Jeremiah, the son of Habaziniah, and his brethren, and all his sons, and the whole house of the Rechabites;

4 And I brought them into the house of the LORD, [d] into the chamber of the sons of Hanan, the son of Igdaliah, [e] a man of God, which was by [f] the chamber of the princes, which was above the chamber of Maaseiah the son of Shallum, [g] the keeper of the * door.

5 And I set before the sons of the house of the Rechabites pots full of wine, and cups, and I said unto them, [h] Drink ye wine.

6 But they said, We will drink no wine: [i] for Jonadab the son of Rechab our father commanded us, saying, [k] Ye shall drink no wine, Neither ye, nor your sons, for ever:

7 Neither shall ye build house, nor sow seed, nor plant vineyard, nor have any: but [l] all your days ye shall dwell in tents; [m] that ye may live many days in the land where ye be strangers.

8 Thus have [n] we obeyed the voice of Jonadab the son of Rechab our father, in all that he hath charged us, to drink no wine all our days, we, our wives, our sons, nor our daughters;

9 Nor to build houses for us to dwell in: [o] neither have we vineyard, nor field, nor seed:

10 But we have dwelt in tents, and have obeyed, and done according to all that Jonadab our father commanded us.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXV. V. 4. The Rechabites were a family of the Kenites, who descended from Moses' father-in-law, (Notes, Judg. i. 15. 1 Chron. ii. 55.) They had dwelt in the land from the first, but no inheritance seems to have been allotted them. It was doubtless well known, that they had rules of conduct peculiar to themselves: but this trial was made, to show their steady adherence to their rules, and the reasons they assigned for it, in order to shame the disobedience of the Jews. (Marg. Ref.) 'The Rechabites were descended from the Kenites; they were never 'incorporated with the Jews;—but yet were looked on as 'friends and allies.—They were worshippers of the true 'God, though they were not circumcised.' (Lowth.)—The prophet seems to have brought the Rechabites into a chamber adjoining to the temple, and to have been particular in describing it, in order to render the transaction more public: and Hanan being a man of God, would readily accommodate them.

V. 5. God commanded Jeremiah to give the Rechabites wine to drink; but he did not command them to drink, so that they were free to refuse it.

V. 6, 7. (Note, 2 Kings x. 15, 16.) Jonadab lived about three hundred years before this time. He had probably practised these rules himself; and having trained up his children to habits of abstemiousness, he enjoined them and their posterity to adhere to them. He seems to have desired, that they should be, as much as possible, kept from temptations to avarice, luxury, and sensuality; and be a hardy, self-denied, and industrious race. He might also foresee the calamities, which were likely to come on Judah and Israel, and desire that his posterity should be prepared for the worst. He seems to have wished them to avoid giving umbrage, or exciting the jealousy or envy of those among whom they lived, which would have been the natural effect of their living in opulence, magnificence, or luxury: for one reason of his rules was, "that they might "live long in the land where they were strangers." But, above all, he doubtless meant that they should be devoted to God, as a race of perpetual Nazarites: and he deemed these rules conducive to this end, and calculated to render them simple, humble, patient, and superior to the delights of sense. Such injunctions of dying parents, or others, can only be considered as counsels: and if consistent with Scripture, suited to the circumstances of the times, and neither put in the place of the merits of Christ, nor in that of obedience to God's commandments, but subordinated to them, and used in subserviency to true godliness, they may be given and observed with propriety and advantage. The Rechabites and the Nazarites resembled the religious orders in the Romish church, more than any other persons in the Old Testament; yet they were not forbidden to marry, nor commanded "to abstain from meats." No restriction was laid on them in these respects.

12 ¶ Then came the word of the LORD unto Jeremiah, saying,

13 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Go and tell the men of Judah, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, [r] Will ye not receive instruction to hearken to my words? saith the LORD.

14 The words of Jonadab the son of Rechab, that he commanded his sons not to drink wine, are performed; for unto this day they drink none, but obey their father's commandment; notwithstanding [s] I have spoken unto you, rising early and speaking; [t] but ye hearkened not unto me.

15 I have sent also unto you all my servants the prophets, rising up early and sending them, saying, [u] Return ye now every man from his evil way, and amend your doings, and go not after other gods to serve them, and [x] ye shall dwell in the land which I have given to you and to your fathers: but ye have not inclined your ear, nor hearkened unto me.

16 Because [y] the sons of Jonadab the son of Rechab have performed the commandment of their father, which he commanded them; but this people hath not hearkened unto me:

17 Therefore thus saith the LORD God of hosts, the God of Israel; Behold, [z] I will bring upon Judah, and upon all the inhabitants of Jerusalem, all the evil that I have pronounced against them: [a] because I have spoken unto them, but they have not heard; and I have called unto them, but they have not answered.

18 ¶ And Jeremiah said unto the house of the Rechabites, Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; [b] Because ye have obeyed the commandment of Jonadab your father, and kept all his precepts, and done according unto all he hath commanded you:

19 Therefore thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; * Jonadab the son of Rechab shall not want a man [c] to stand before me for ever.

V. 11. The Rechabites abode at Jerusalem at this time, not by choice, or through any relaxation of their rules, but to shelter themselves from the invaders. (Note, 2 Kings xxiv. 2.)

V. 13—16. The command given to the Rechabites originated from a man like themselves, to whom their obligations were small, when compared with those of the Jews to their God; and whose authority was limited and inconsiderable, compared with that of JEHOVAH. When Jonadab died, all his authority expired with him: he could no longer remind his children of his injunctions, take cognizance of their conduct, reward their obedience, or punish their disobedience. Yet, out of respect to his memory, deference to his wisdom, or experience of the salutary effects of his counsels, they persevered in observing them. But the Jews disobeyed the commands of God, who daily loaded them with benefits; whose authority continued in full force; who earnestly and frequently reminded them of their duty, and called them to repentance; and who could reward or punish them, as much and as long as he pleased! Moreover, the commands of Jonadab were far more rigorous than the divine laws, and forbad the use and possession of those things, which God allowed his people to possess and to enjoy. All these considerations tended to expose the folly, ingratitude, and unreasonableness of their disobedience.

V. 18, 19. The Rechabites seem to have been preserved comparatively uncorrupt, by observing these rules: their respect to their venerable ancestor was commendable, and showed a docile disposition; their peculiarities do not seem to have been leavened by superstition, spiritual pride, moroseness, or censoriousness; but to have been subservient to piety. Their temperance, frugality, and hardiness, would favour their preservation amid the desolations of the land; even their poverty would tend to secure them from the conqueror: and it was proper that God should avow his readiness to reward every degree of good, when he determined to punish his apostate people. Accordingly he promised, that the family of the Rechabites should be very durably continued; and upheld in the practice of piety and righteousness before him, as his accepted worshippers, even when the Jews were cast out of his sight. This appears to be the meaning of the expression, "to "stand before the LORD:" for it cannot be supposed that they performed any service at the temple. Nothing is known respecting the fulfilment of this promise; but doubtless it was performed, and perhaps may be so to this day.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Every method should be used to bring men to repentance: and when promises and threatenings prove ineffectual, we should attempt to shame them out of their iniquities. Man is greatly the creature of habit: thus the abstemiousness, which to some would be intolerable, to others is easy, because customary; and they are not affected by temptations, which to others are irresistible. The longer and the more carefully wise and pious men have observed the course of the world, the more fully have they been convinced that it is vain, vexatious, and ensnaring: and that separation from it, (as far as duty will admit,) is far safer and happier, than the most successful pursuit of its pleasures and possessions. It may not be adviseable for us to restrict ourselves by such rules, as were prescribed by Jonadab: but it is necessary to learn indifference about all

CHAP. XXXVI.

Jeremiah, at God's command, causes Baruch to write in a roll all his threatening prophecies, 1—7. Baruch reads the roll publicly, and afterwards to the princes, who counsel him and Jeremiah to hide themselves, 8—19. Jehudi reads it before Jehoiakim, who casts it into the fire, contrary to the request of the princes; and orders Jeremiah and Baruch to be apprehended: "but the LORD "hid them," 20—26. Jeremiah is directed again to write the same, with many like words, and a dreadful sentence against the king; which he does by the hand of Baruch, 27—32.

worldly things; to consider ourselves as strangers on earth, and to be devoted to God, and disposed to prefer that station, and that way of life, which are best for our souls. We should habituate our appetites to brook denial even in things lawful; and thus inure ourselves to resist temptation, to be contented with mean fare, and to be prepared for all events. It is not generally adviseable for young persons to forsake the plain honest employments of their parents; or to be ambitious of living in a more elegant or fashionable style: that is, amid stronger temptations to pride, luxury, sensuality and rapacity. Prudence and moderation are conducive to piety; and tend to preserve families from the contagion of prevailing iniquity and ungodliness: by shunning competition and envy, they tend to peace and comfort; by avoiding excess, they promote health and long life: the more mortified we are to this present world, the readier we shall be to leave it, that we may go to a better: and thus we may live and die happy, though we never possess houses or lands, or those other envied acquisitions, which most men waste their lives in pursuing. But whatever rules we prescribe to ourselves or receive from others, we must count nothing indispensable but the law of God: for there will be circumstances, when regard to safety may render it necessary to dispense with them. Yet no prudence or good behaviour can exempt us from sharing the common calamities, to which sin hath subjected mankind. How common is it for men to be more observant of the rules of their order, circle, or sect, or of the traditions of their fathers, than professed Christians are of the precepts of God's word! Respect to the memory, and authority or counsel, of pious parents will always meet with some recompense from God, and is commonly made effectual for the continuance of true religion in families through successive generations. But they who can neither be awed by the terror, nor allured by the goodness, of God, to repent of sin and return to him; who despise his authority, which is absolute; their obligations to him, which are infinite; his justice and wrath, which are almighty to punish, and his mercy and readiness to forgive, which are boundless and everlasting, will perish miserably: and all the world will see the justice of God in the condemnation of those who disobey his commandments, and neglect his great salvation.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXVI. V. 1. (Notes, xxv. 1—7. xxx. 2.)

V. 2. From, &c. This was twenty-three years, from the thirteenth of Josiah, when the prophet was first appointed to his office. (Notes, i.)

V. 3. The Lord foresaw that the people would not hear and obey: but it was proper that the prophet should do every thing that could tend to awaken their attention. His endeavours might be useful to individuals, and the rebels would thus appear the more inexcusable. 'God's 'foreknowledge of future events does not put any force 'upon men's will, or take away the liberty of human ac-'tions.' (Lowth.)

V. 4. Jeremiah seems not to have possessed the skill "of a ready writer;" and therefore Baruch, who might be a more learned man, was employed as his secretary. We frequently read of him, as the assistant and companion of Jeremiah; (Notes, xlv.) (Marg. Ref.) but the apocryphal book that bears his name seems to be altogether a forgery.

V. 5. 'He was under confinement, for having given 'offence to the king, or the great men, by his prophecies; 'a calamity which often befel him!' (Lowth.) supplication before the LORD, and will return every one from his evil way: [r] for great is the anger and fury that the LORD hath pronounced against this people.

8 And Baruch the son of Neriah [s] did according to all that Jeremiah the prophet commanded him, reading in the book the words of the LORD in the LORD's house.

B. C. 606.

9 And it came to pass, [t] in the fifth year of Jehoiakim, the son of Josiah, king of Judah, in the ninth month, [u] that they proclaimed a fast before the LORD to all the people in Jerusalem, and to all the people that came from the cities of Judah unto Jerusalem.

10 Then read Baruch in the book the words of Jeremiah in the house of the LORD, [x] in the chamber of [y] Gemariah, the son of Shaphan [z] the scribe, in the higher court, at the entry of the new * gate of the LORD's house, in the ears of all the people.

11 When Michaiah the son of Gemariah, the son of [a] Shaphan, had heard out of the book all the words of the LORD;

12 Then he went down into the king's house, into the scribe's chamber, and, lo, all the princes sat there, even [b] Elishama the scribe, and Delaiah the son of Shemaiah, and [c] Elnathan the son of Achbor, and [d] Gemariah the son of Shaphan, and Zedekiah the son of Hananiah, and all the princes, 13 Then Michaiah [e] declared unto them all the words that he had heard, when Baruch read the book in the ears of the people.

14 Therefore all the princes sent Jehudi the son of [f] Nethaniah, the son of Shelemiah, the son of [g] Cushi, unto Baruch, saying, Take in thine hand the roll wherein thou hast read in the ears of the people, and come. So Baruch the son of Neriah [h] took the roll in his hand, and came unto them.

15 And they said unto him, Sit down now and read it in our ears. So Baruch read it in their ears.

16 Now it came to pass, when they had heard all the words, [i] they were afraid, both one and other, and said unto Baruch, [k] We will surely tell the king of all these words.

17 And they asked Baruch, saying, [l] Tell us now, How didst thou write all these words at his mouth?

18 Then Baruch answered them, [m] He pronounced all these words unto me with his mouth, and I wrote them with ink in the book.

V. 6, 7. Some think, that this was the great expiation, called, by way of eminence, the fast: (Acts xxvii. 9:) but others suppose it to have been a fast that was observed on account of the calamitous state of the nation. 'He 'showeth, that fasting, without prayer and repentance, 'availeth nothing, but is mere hypocrisy.'

V. 9. As the command was given in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, and this is dated in his fifth year, many expositors are of opinion that the roll was twice read: once in the fourth year, when it was little noticed, and afterwards in the fifth year. And as Jeremiah was shut up, when he first ordered Baruch to read the roll, but had liberty to make his escape after it had been read, (5. 19;) they conclude that two distinct readings must be intended. Others think, that the writing of the roll might take up a consi derable time; and that it was deemed expedient to wait for the fasting day, as the most convenient time for reading it, which was in the fifth year of Jehoiakim: and that Jeremiah was not shut up in prison, but confined from going to the temple, by some other hinderance: and though he was at liberty when the notice was taken of Baruch's reading the roll, yet he had not gone up to the temple to read it himself. If the roll was twice read, (which indeed seems the more probable opinion,) it is supposed, that the first time was on the great day of atonement: and that soon after Nebuchadnezzar took Jerusalem, and carried Jehoiakim to Babylon, (Note, 2 Kings, xxiv. 1. Dan. i. 2.) But having made submissions to the victor, he was restored to the throne; and just after his return the roll was read the second time, on a fast, proclaimed and observed in commemoration of that first taking of Jerusalem; and which hath ever since been annually observed by the Jews on the eighteenth day of the ninth month.

V. 10. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11—13. Though the fast was proclaimed by authority, yet it does not appear, that either the King or his princes attended the observance of it at the temple. Nor can it be determined, whether Michaiah meant to call the attention of the princes to the word of God, or to inform them against Baruch. Baruch had the use of Gemariah's chamber, who was father to Michaiah, and probably by his consent; and Ahikam, another of Shaphan's sons, protected Jeremiah on a similar occasion. (xxvi. 24:) Yet neither Gemariah nor Ahikam seem to have been present when the roll was read.

V. 16. 'The judgments denounced were so terrible as 'to make the ears of them that heard them to tingle.' (Lowth.)—'The godly were afraid, seeing God was so 'offended; and the wicked were astonished at the horror 'of the punishment.'

V. 17, 18. Perhaps the princes supposed that Baruch had written his roll from memory; and that it was rather 19 Then said the princes unto Baruch, [n] Go, hide thee, thou and Jeremiah; and let no man know where ye be.

20 ¶ And they went in to the king into the court, (but [o] they laid up the roll in the chamber of Elishama the scribe,) and told all the words in the ears of the king.

21 So the king sent [p] Jehudi to fetch the roll: and he took it out of Elishama the scribe's chamber. [q] And Jehudi read it in the ears of the king, and in the ears of all the princes which stood beside the king.

22 Now the king sat [r] in the winter-house in the ninth month: and there was a fire on the hearth burning before him.

23 And it came to pass, that when Jehudi had read three or four leaves, [s] he cut it with the penknife, and cast it into the fire that was on the hearth, until the roll was consumed in the fire that was on the hearth.

24 Yet [t] they were not afraid, [u] nor rent their garments, neither the king, nor any of his servants that heard all these words.

25 Nevertheless [x] Elnathan, and Delaiah, and Gemariah had [y] made intercession to the king that he would not burn the roll: but he would not hear them.

26 But the king commanded Jerahmeel the son of * Hammelech, and Seraiah the son of Azriel, and Shelemiah the son of Abdeel, [z] to take Baruch the scribe and Jeremiah the prophet; [a] but the LORD hid them.

27 ¶ Then the word of the LORD came to Jeremiah, (after [b] that the king had burned the roll, and the words which Baruch wrote at the mouth of Jeremiah,) saying,

28 Take thee again [c] another roll, and write in it all the former words that were in the first roll, which Jehoiakim the king of Judah hath burned.

29 And thou shalt say to Jehoiakim king of Judah, Thus saith the LORD; [d] Thou hast burned this roll, saying, [e] Why hast thou written therein, saying, The king of Babylon shall certainly come and destroy this land, and shall cause to cease from thence man and beast?

30 Therefore thus saith the LORD of Jehoiakim king of Judah; [f] He shall have none to sit upon the throne of David: [g] and his dead body shall be cast out in the day to the heat, and in the night to the frost.

to be considered as his composition, than as the substance of Jeremiah's prophecies: and they might ask this apparently frivolous question, in order to silence the alarms excited by considering it as the word of God, and in full force against them. But Baruch, with great simplicity, so answered their question, as to show that he only acted as amanuensis to Jeremiah, and wrote verbatim what he had dictated to him.

V. 19. The princes had some conviction, that this was a message from God, and were not disposed to persecute Baruch or Jeremiah; yet they would not duly regard the divine authority, nor venture the king's displeasure. He must be informed, and they were aware that he would attempt to apprehend Jeremiah and Baruch, and therefore they advised them to conceal themselves.

V. 23—25. It was scarcely possible for a man to show more contempt and defiance of God, than Jehoiakim did on this occasion. The predictions that he had heard had been delivered during a long course of years, by a prophet of established reputation: many of his prophecies had already been fulfilled; as Jehoiakim's late captivity at Babylon, and his state of subjection to Nebuchadnezzar, proved: and they were all coincident with the written word of God, and were addressed immediately to him and his princes. Yet he treated them with the utmost disregard; and deliberately burned the roll, as if the destruction of the sentence could have prevented its execution! And though his princes were not so totally callous, but entreated him not to burn the roll: yet it was a great proof of their insensibility, that they rent not their clothes, and showed no tokens of grief or consternation, either when the roll was read, or when it was so impiously destroyed. Compare Jehoiakim's conduct with that of his father Josiah, in circumstances not totally dissimilar. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 26. Hid, &c. Jeremiah and Baruch, by divine direction, lay concealed in some place where their persecutors could not find them.

V. 29. To Jehoiakim. 'Or, "of Jehoiakim;" for this 'command seems to have been given to Jeremiah during 'the time of his concealment.' (Lowth.) This is the latest prophecy of Jeremiah, in which Jehoiakim is mentioned, or which is dated from the years of his reign; though he lived about six years afterwards, (xxv. 1. xxvi. 1.) Perhaps the prophet lay concealed, during that whole time, from the blood-thirsty rage of the king: at least he was directed to let him alone, as one given up to a reprobate mind, for his daring impiety and wickedness on this occasion: while the sentence denounced against him, not being immediately executed, and the prophet apparently silenced, he would be the more hardened in treating the whole as a delusion.

V. 30, 31. (Note, xxii. 18, 19.) Jeconiah sat a very short time on his father's throne, and being carried captive to Babylon, was succeeded by his uncle Zedekiah. No other of Jehoiakim's race was king over Judah, though some of them had authority under the kings of Persia: and Mary the mother of our Lord was not descended from Solomon, but from Nathan the son of David. Jeconiah indeed is mentioned in our Lord's genealogy by St. Matthew; but that is the line of Joseph, not of Mary, (Notes, xxii. 29, 30. Matt. i. Luke ii. 23—38.)

V. 32. 'Though the wicked think to have abolished 'the word of God, when they have burnt the book there-'of, yet this declareth that God will not only raise it up 'again, but also increase it, in greater abundance, to their 'condemnation.' During the persecutions, which the Papists carried on against the reformers and others whom they called heretics; the burning of Bibles was a very common practice, to which this note refers.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—19.

Faithful ministers must use every method of awakening the consciences of sinners, if 'peradventure God will "give them repentance, to the acknowledging of the "truth." His revealed word, and not his secret purpose, is the rule of their conduct; and they must "de-"clare his whole counsel," whether men will hear or forbear, and without desisting because of ill success.—The Lord declares the evil he purposes to do against sinners; that they may "hear and fear, and return from "their evil ways:" they who make this use of his warnings, in dependence on his promised mercy, will find him ready to forgive all their iniquities; and all others will be left without excuse. Different advantages result from the proposal of truth by word of mouth, and by writing; the former is generally more copious, particular, energetic, and affecting; the latter more exact, compendious, and permanent. Both should then be used, "according to "the ability that God giveth to every man." Many attend upon the outward forms of Religion, and pretend humiliation, mortification, and devotions, who are not humbled for their sins, and who do not mortify their lusts, present their supplication before the Lord, or turn from their evil ways. Yet when multitudes are collected together on such occasions, the ministers of God may find a favourable opportunity of calling them to repentance, and warning them to flee from impending judgments. But national fasts, without national reformation, will avail little to turn away the wrath of God; especially as they who appoint such solemnities, often do not so much as sanction them by their own example! A faithful declaration of divine truth will attract some attention: but in general it reaches last the ears of those who are most advanced in rank and authority, and too often finds them most closed against it. Even such as have some conviction of the truth and importance of what they hear, and are disposed to favour those employed in preaching it, are so surrounded with persons of another stamp, and have so many reserves about their own safety, ease, character, interest, or preferment, that they often dare not act according to their convictions, but endeavour to silence them as soon as they can, by some evasion or other: and they often flatter themselves into a persuasion, that they act nobly in their circumstances, if they do not take an active part in persecution, but covertly shelter the servants of God from the rage of their enemies. But they who would follow the Lord wholly, and be indeed the disciples of Christ, must be prepared to venture and suffer every thing in his cause.

V. 20—32.

There are degrees of guilt even among the ungodly; and condemnation will be proportioned to them. Some rapidly arrive at the height of impiety and presumption; and none more so, than they who have broken off from a religious education. Many act as if their outrages against the word of God could save them from the condemnation denounced by it; or as if their irrational infidelity could invalidate all the demonstrations which we have of its divine original, and render the sacred oracles of none effect! But such persons should be openly opposed, whatever their rank in life or abilities may be: and a few gentle persuasions do not form a sufficient testimony against their impiety: but their contempt of God's word should be noticed with unequivocal tokens of disapprobation, concern, yea, abhorrence. The Lord himself will protect those who are valiant for his truth, from all their enemies, until they have finished their testimony; and then it is of small consequence by what means they are removed to heaven. But all their opposers will treasure up wrath, and add to the weight of that condemnation, which they would not endure to be told of: for God will honour those who honour him, and in proportion as men despise him, they must sink into contempt and misery.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXVII. V. 1—5. Nebuchadnezzar made Zedekiah king, and entered into covenant with him, having caused him to swear allegiance in the name of JEHOVAH: yet Zedekiah, despising this oath and covenant, formed an alliance with the king of Egypt, and depending on his assistance rebelled against Nebuchadnezzar, (Notes, Ez. xvii. Marg. Ref.) Accordingly Pharaoh sent an army to his relief, which caused the Chaldeans to raise the siege of Jerusalem.

V. 10. Wounded, &c. Or "men, who had been run "through;" that is, mortally wounded. God would work miracles for the Chaldeans, rather than let the Jews escape the threatened vengeance.

V. 12—15. Many of the Jews seem to have taken the opportunity of the Chaldeans' departure, to leave the city either to attend to their private concerns, or to shift for their safety: and Jeremiah, seeing no prospect of doing any good, sought to retire, either to Anathoth or some other place. It is not clear what his intentions were: however, the Lord had otherwise appointed concerning him; and the malignity of his people was exposed by it. For being met with by Irijah, who was the grandson of Hananiah, (the false prophet, as it is most probable, Notes, xxviii.) he was apprehended, and accused of deserting to the Chaldeans; because he had counselled the people to surrender, as the only method of saving themselves and the city: and though he denied the charge, (and doubtless he had no such intention,) he was treated with the utmost cruelty and indignity, and committed to the most dismal and noisome prison which the enraged princes could find out. The former word, rendered prison, often means chains. "They "put him in chains, in the house," &c.

In the midst, &c. (12.) Or "from among his people." (Lowth.) The Septuagint renders it, "to buy among his "people;" that is, to buy provisions, which were scarce in the city; but the original does not admit of that meaning.

16 ¶ When Jeremiah was entered into the dungeon, and into the * cabins, and Jeremiah had remained there many days;

17 Then Zedekiah the king sent and took him out: and the king [b] asked him secretly in his house, and said, [c] Is there any word from the LORD? And Jeremiah said, There is: for, said he, [d] thou shalt be delivered into the hand of the king of Babylon.

18 Moreover Jeremiah said unto king Zedekiah, [e] What have I offended against thee, or against thy servants, or against this people, that ye have put me in prison?

19 Where are now [f] your prophets which prophesied unto you, saying, The king of Babylon shall not come against you, nor against this land?

20 Therefore hear now, I pray thee, O my lord the king: let my supplication, I pray thee, † be accepted before thee; that thou cause me not to return to the house of Jonathan the scribe, [g] lest I die there.

21 Then Zedekiah the king commanded that they should commit Jeremiah [h] into the court of the prison, [i] and that they should give him daily a piece of bread out of the bakers' street, [k] until all the bread in the city were spent. [l] Thus Jeremiah remained in the court of the prison.

V. 16. The prophet was left for a considerable time in this wretched condition, namely, till the Chaldeans returned and renewed the siege.

V. 17—21. The princes of Jehoiakim were more favourable to the prophet than their king, and afraid of his displeasure: but Zedekiah was less inveterate than his princes, and afraid of them in favouring him. When Jeremiah was interrogated about the word of the Lord, he neither concealed nor softened his message, but plainly told the king, that he would be delivered into the hand of the king of Babylon: yet he meant to plead for favour, and to present his supplication to him; to which this might have been deemed a very impolitic preface. But he had truth, reason, justice, and the king's conscience, on his side; and he needed no subterfuges or artifices. He could appeal to Zedekiah, that he had not offended him or his princes, except by faithfully declaring his message: and the flattering prophets, who had promised them peace, were convicted by the event of being deceivers. Surely then he ought not to be sent back to his noisome dungeon, where he must shortly die by famine or disease. Zedekiah indeed was induced in some measure to grant his request, yet he still kept him confined; and though he gave orders that he should be supplied with food, so as to secure him from dying for want; yet his sustenance was mean and scanty, and he was soon after treated with great cruelty.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Numbers witness the fatal effects of other men's sins, and yet heedlessly step into their places, and steer the same destructive course: and many, who pay no regard to the instructions and warnings of faithful ministers, will in great extremities, desire their prayers. Every respite given to hardened sinners encourages their presumption; they trust to fallacious appearances, and despise the word of God; and they deceive themselves by vain words, till wrath comes upon them to the uttermost. But whatever present appearances may be, the Scriptures must be fulfilled, and the feeblest, most unlikely, or despised persons will suffice to execute the vengeance of God, and to disappoint the confidence of those who rebel against him. It is unspeakably wearisome to zealous ministers, to witness those crimes and miseries which they cannot prevent: and cruel treatment, united with ill success, is apt to render them reluctant to their work, and disposed to court privacy and obscurity. But every step they take will be misrepresented by perverse opposers: the most disinterested friends of their country may sometimes be treated as traitors or rebels, and the most upright and blameless accused of the worst of crimes; and such calumnies will meet with more credit than all their asseverations and pleas in their own behalf. Thus, whilst the enemies of God have lodged in palaces and indulged in luxury, his faithful servants have been smarting with wounds, loaded with ignominy and fetters, immured in loathsome dungeons, or dying by famine or torture. But ere long it will be said of the afflicted believer, and to the prosperous sinner, "Now he is comforted, but thou art tormented." Many secretly favour the servants of God, who, through fear of man and love of sin, will not follow their counsel. No respect of persons, or carnal policy, must warp the plain and direct testimony of the faithful minister, when addressing himself to the proudest and most powerful of the sons of men, whose frown he has most cause to fear, and from whose favour he might hope many temporal advantages. Yet, as far as consists with this faithfulness, he may properly reason with those who injuriously treat him; inquire what offence he has committed by plainly speaking the word of God; and show that they who flatter them are proved to be deceivers by evident facts, and stand condemned even in the consciences of those who suffer themselves to be deluded by them: and even they, who are most ready to die for the truth, may and ought to use lawful means of self-preservation, and of obtaining fairer treatment. All this, however, should be done with great meekness; without reproaches, or acrimonious complaints: and the bolder any man is in the cause of God, the more gentle, patient, and pliant, should he be about his own concerns: his message must be delivered with authority over the consciences even of the greatest princes; but he should be ready to speak with deference and submission, and as a supplicant, when pleading his own cause. The Lord has all hearts in his hands, and can incline his enemies to favour his servants as much as he sees good: yet they who would be faithful to him, must prepare for enduring hardship and tribulation in this evil world.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXVIII. V. 1—6. Some of these persons were sent by Zedekiah to Jeremiah, to inquire concerning the event of the siege, and to desire his prayers. (Notes, xxi. 1—10. xxxvii. 6—10.) Jeremiah, though confined in the court of the prison, continued to prophesy; and they who had access to him dispersed his predictions throughout the city. This greatly offended the princes, who determined to defend themselves to the last extremity; and they resolved to put him to death. In order to this they represented him to the king, as an enemy to his people, who intentionally sought their hurt; though his labours, sufferings, tears, and supplications, abundantly proved his fervent love to them: and Zedekiah (who seems to have been a prince of slender capacity, and who was greatly in the power of his nobles, by reason of his difficult circumstances;) would not venture any thing to protect him, but abjectly left him in the hands of his enemies. Having thus got his consent, the malicious princes without delay caused the prophet to be let down into a dungeon or pit, where he sank in the mire, and must soon miserably have perished. Probably they intended to have then given out that he died in prison; and perhaps this dungeon was prepared for such silent executions. 'Some think that when he was in this 'dismal place, he made those mournful meditations, which 'are set down in the third chapter of the Lamentations.' (Lowth.)—Hammelech signifies the king: the dungeon seems to have belonged to one of Zedekiah's sons.

cast clouts and rotten rags under thine arm-holes, under the cords. And Jeremiah did so.

13 So they drew up Jeremiah with cords, and took him up out of the dungeon: [z] and Jeremiah remained in the court of the prison.

14 ¶ Then Zedekiah the king [a] sent, and took Jeremiah the prophet unto him into the * third entry that is in the house of the LORD: and the king said unto Jeremiah, [b] I will ask thee a thing; hide nothing from me.

15 Then Jeremiah said unto Zedekiah, If I declare it unto thee, [c] wilt thou not surely put me to death? and if I give thee counsel, wilt thou not hearken unto me?

16 So Zedekiah the king [d] sware secretly unto Jeremiah, saying, As the LORD liveth, [e] that made us this soul, I will not put thee to death, neither will I give thee into the hand [f] of these men that seek thy life.

17 Then said Jeremiah unto Zedekiah, Thus saith the LORD, the God of hosts, the God of Israel, [g] If thou wilt assuredly go forth unto the king of Babylon's princes, then thy soul shall live, and this city shall not be burned with fire; and thou shalt live, and thine house.

18 But [h] if thou wilt not go forth to the king of Babylon's princes, [i] then shall this city be given into the hand of the Chaldeans, and they shall burn it with fire, and thou shalt not escape out of their hand.

19 And Zedekiah the king said unto Jeremiah, [k] I am afraid of the Jews that are fallen to the Chaldeans, lest they deliver me into their hand, and they [l] mock me.

20 But Jeremiah said, They shall not deliver thee. [m] Obey, I beseech thee, the voice of the LORD, which I speak unto thee: so it shall be well unto thee, and thy soul shall live.

21 But [n] if thou refuse to go forth, [o] this is the word that the LORD hath shewed me:

22 And, behold, [p] all the women that are left in the king of Judah's house, shall be brought forth to the king of Babylon's princes, and those women shall say, * Thy friends [q] have set thee on, and have prevailed against thee, [r] thy feet

V. 7—13. We have here an example of fortitude and active kindness as noble, as the conduct of the princes was base and disingenuous. Ebed-melech, a Cushite, a stranger, probably a negro, whose name seems to imply that he had been the king's slave, though now preferred, was employed to deliver the prophet, and to shame the Jews. Hearing that Jeremiah had been cast into the dungeon; without hesitation or delay, and without fearing the wrath of the nobles, he boldly went to Zedekiah, when engaged in public business; and plainly told him, that they had done evil, in acting so cruelly towards the prophet of God; and that he must soon perish for hunger in the dungeon: (for perhaps he was not aware that he must have been suffocated with the mire, or destroyed by the exhalations of so noisome a cavern.) By this representation he obtained from the king a commission to rescue Jeremiah, and a guard to protect him in this service, which he performed with great promptitude and tenderness; and thus saved a most valuable life, though not without the hazard of his own.

To die for, &c. 'They needed not to have put him into 'the dungeon; he would have died of hunger, without add-'ing the cruelty of that punishment; "for there is, &c." (Lowth.)—This, however, does not seem to be the obvious meaning of the words: and perhaps Ebed-melech was not aware what a dreadful place the dungeon was; but was fully assured that the prophet, being confined and out of sight, would perish by hunger, for none would carry him any food, when the famine in the city was extreme.

V. 15, 16. Jeremiah could not but consider Zedekiah as concerned in the cruelty with which he had been treated; yet he made no complaints. He was not, however, forward to repeat those warnings and counsels, which seemed only to endanger his own life, and to increase the guilt of the king. 'The prophet had such experience of 'the unsteadiness of the king's temper, of his backward-'ness in following good counsel, and want of courage to 'stand by those that advised him well, that he might with 'good reason resolve not to venture his life, to serve a 'man that was, in a manner, incapable of being directed.' (Lowth.) It does not appear, that he was charged with any message at this time to Zedekiah; though informed of the will of God respecting him. The questions proposed by the prophet implied, that he required Zedekiah to promise not to put him to death, and that he would follow his counsel, as the condition of his declaring the word of God. Some read the last without an interrogation; "Thou "wilt not hearken to me." The king, however, made no promise of complying with his counsel; but he engaged with a solemn oath, by the living JEHOVAH, the Giver of their lives and souls, that he would neither put him to death, nor leave him in the hands of his enemies.

V. 19. Mock me. Zedekiah was conscious that he had acted basely, in violating his oath to the king of Babylon; and that he was considered by many of the Jews as having brought ruin and infamy on his country by his impolitic measures.

24 Then said Zedekiah unto Jeremiah, Let no man know of these words, and thou shalt not die.

25 But if [t] the princes hear that I have talked with thee, and they come unto thee, and say unto thee, Declare unto us now what thou hast said unto the king, hide it not from us, and we will not put thee to death: also what the king said unto thee:

26 Then thou shalt say unto them, [u] I presented my supplication before the king, that he would not cause me to return to Jonathan's house, to die there.

V. 20—23. The prophet could not alter his message; and if Zedekiah feared the contempt of man more than the wrath of God, he must take the consequence. The Lord, however, assured him, that this evil should not come on him; but on the contrary, that he should meet with kind usage and preserve his life. But if he refused to comply with this humiliating counsel, he must be previously informed, that the women of his household, being delivered up to the princes of Babylon, would certainly upbraid him in his calamities, for trusting to his friends; who having seduced him from his allegiance to Nebuchadnezzar, and engaged him in the unequal contest, had prevailed against him to his ruin; and having entangled him in inextricable difficulties, as if his feet sunk in the mire, had left him to his doom, and turned back from him to secure themselves. Thus his wives and children would fall into the hands of the enraged conquerors, and all the cruelty inflicted on them, as well as his own miseries, and the burning of the city and temple would be the effect of his obstinacy; as he might have prevented them, by submitting to the Chaldeans.

V. 24—28. Zedekiah would not follow the prophet's advice: nay, he even seems to have hesitated as to his oath of protecting him, and to have substituted for it a conditional promise. He was slavishly afraid of the princes. He supposed that they would certainly hear of this interview; and he proposed to him to inform them, that he had petitioned the king not to send him again to the dungeon in Jonathan's house. (Note, xxxvii. 15, 16.) As this was truth, and as the princes had no right to be informed of all that had passed, Jeremiah complied, and was thus preserved in the court of the prison till the city was taken. This seems to have been his last interview with Zedekiah.—What a view do these verses give of the extreme wickedness and impiety prevalent in Judah, especially in the superior orders!—Whatever was proposed to this most eminent and excellent servant of God and friend to his people, by either the king or his nobles; the highest recompense, was a promise that he should not be put to death! A promise, which could not in the smallest degree be depended on.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—13.

Nothing but close confinement or death can totally silence the zealous servant of God: whatever he suffers or fears, he cannot but declare his message, as he hath opportunity; and he cannot consent to any alteration or compromise respecting it. Submission to Providence, and to those who obtain the pre-eminence, is very contrary to the proud heart of man. But though liberty is very valuable, and worthy to be preserved at a great price, yet we must not rebel against God, or throw away our lives, if he please to permit us to be deprived of it.—They who point out to men the only way of safety and happiness, and who spend themselves, in the most disinterested manner, to promote their present and future welfare, must expect to be deemed enemies, and worthy of death, for declaring the whole truth! Doubtless their counsels and warnings tend to weaken the hands of those who fight against God: their words run counter to the projects and lusts, and are uneasy to the consciences, of ungodly men; and therefore they conclude that they seek the hurt, and not the welfare, of the people. Thus the wicked, when armed with power, are pushed forward to persecution; while they who secretly favour them, often do not think it worth while to risk any thing for their protection. Man's cruel ingenuity has invented various methods of torture and destruction; and persecutors have always been most remarkable for refinement in cruelty. Besides the numbers who have been openly tortured and put to death, it will never be known how many servants of God have privately been dispatched, till "the earth shall disclose her blood, "and no more cover her slain." But till the "witnesses "have finished their testimony," the malice of their enemies must be frustrated: for God will raise up instruments for their protection, where they might have been least expected. Equity, humanity, piety, and zealous boldness, in a good cause, have been found in persons of every climate, complexion, or rank in life: and the Lord often chooses those, who by birth, education, and outward circumstances, labour under peculiar disadvantages; in order to shame the conduct of degenerate professors. Even the retirements, or engagements, of princes should be interrupted, to prevent the shedding of innocent blood. In such a cause, we should neither fear the displeasure of man, nor any personal consequence; for where so great evil is about to be done, decided plain language is becoming, though the greatest princes be the perpetrators of the mischief. They who use their influence in the fear of God, to prevent injustice, oppression, or murder, may expect that he will protect and prosper them: and those timid tempers, which are easily seduced into sinful compliances, may often be as easily engaged by firm expostulation, to retract, and to prevent the consequences. Promptitude and tenderness should always concur in our efforts to relieve the distressed; and the manner of showing kindness is sometimes as expressive and as agreeable, as the favour itself.

The man of God must never yield to resentment, or suffer himself to be overcome of evil: he must ever be ready to give good counsel, and to promote the salvation of those who have most deeply injured him: he ought to do any thing to win upon them, except flattering them or offending his Lord. It is not always necessary to exasperate proud men, by repeated warnings, which they have often heard in vain. It may be proper to appeal to their consciences, whether they be not determined against doing the will of God, though they pretend to inquire after it? And it may sometimes be prudent to require of them promises, that they will not resent or punish us for what is spoken. Yet, if any relenting appear, and there be even a distant hope of succeeding, we should not be too anxious about our own safety; but declare the whole counsel of God, and leave the event with him. Whilst men have only some general convictions, and not a steady realizing faith, they will be unstable in all their ways. The fear of reproach will preponderate against the fear of almighty God: and every trifle will induce them to refuse that obedience, which alone can ensure their welfare and the life of their souls. Thus men treat faithful monitors as enemies, and flattering sycophants as bosom-friends, and bring on themselves by disobedience the very evils they dreaded from obedience; till their feet sink in the mire, their selfish friends forsake them, and they involve their families and connexions with them in inevitable destruction. But when ministers faithfully counsel and warn powerful ungodly men, they may consider themselves as highly favoured, if they be not put to death, or delivered up to the will of their enemies. The less men fear God, the more they fear their fellow creatures; and often they dare not act according to their own judgments, consciences, or inclinations, lest they should be censured by their own servants! We are not, however, bound to speak all we know to gratify our enemies, when no good end can be answered: and a partial evasive answer, if not contrary to truth, is sufficient for an impertinent and malicious inquiry. We have then need to be "wise as serpents, and "harmless as doves."

V. 11—14. Nebuchadnezzar doubtless had heard of Jeremiah's predictions, many of which were now fulfilled, and this would dispose him to respect his character: he had likewise no doubt been informed, that the prophet had suffered many things, for advising the Jews to surrender. The prophet was therefore set at liberty, to go home to Anathoth, or elsewhere, as he pleased, and accordingly he at length joined the remnant under Gedaliah. (Notes, xl. 1—6.)

V. 15—18. This message was sent to Ebed-melech before the taking of the city. He seems to have been afraid of the princes, whom he had offended by his kindness to Jeremiah: but the Lord assured him, that they would in a very little time be deprived of power; for the city would soon be destroyed. And at the same time he was assured of protection in that catastrophe: he should escape with his life, whilst others fell by the sword: seeing he had so trusted in the Lord, as to expose himself to danger, by rescuing his prophet from his powerful persecutors.—It is worth remark, that his confidence in God, rather than his kindness to Jeremiah, is assigned as the special reason of the promise here made to him. Had he been kind to the prophet, merely from humanity, or inferior motives, it would not have been noticed in this manner; but exerting himself to deliver a prophet, "in "the name of a prophet, he received a prophet's reward." (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

"He that being often reproved hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly perish, and that without remedy:" and they, who will not credit the words of God, will be dreadfully convinced by the event, that not one of them fails of accomplishment.—They fatally err, who mistake reprieves for pardons; and they labour in vain, who attempt to resist or elude the executioners of divine vengeance.—External sanctity will be equally unavailing with magnificence or strong fortifications, to defend sinners against deserved wrath; and their obstinacy often occasions the ruin and misery of their children, relatives, and neighbours, as well as their own.—How precarious are earthly possessions! And how soon are they shifted from one hand to another, especially in times of public calamity! But whether the Lord make men poor or rich, nothing can durably profit them, whilst they cleave to their sins.—The servants of God alone are prepared for all events; they are delivered and comforted, when the wicked are suffering for their crimes; and they often meet with more respect and kindness from the profane, than from hypocrites. God, however, will raise them up friends, and do them good, and perform all his promises to them. "In every nation, "he that feareth God, and worketh righteousness, is "accepted of him:" and he will reward men for the kindness that they show to his people for his sake. He

So the captain of the guard [i] gave him victuals and a reward, and let him go.

6 Then went Jeremiah unto Gedaliah the son of Ahikam to [k] Mizpah; and dwelt with him among the people that were left in the land.

7 ¶ Now when [l] all the captains of the forces which were in the fields, even they and their men, heard that the king of Babylon had made Gedaliah the son of Ahikam governor in the land, and had committed unto him men, and women, and children, and of [m] the poor of the land, of them that were not carried away captive to Babylon;

8 Then they [n] came to Gedaliah to Mizpah, [o] even Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, and Johanan and [p] Jonathan the sons of Kareah, and Seraiah the son of Tanhumeth, and the sons of Ephai [q] the Netophathite, and Jezaniah the son of [r] a Maachathite, they and their men.

9 And Gedaliah the son of Ahikam the son of Shaphan [s] sware unto them, and to their men, saying, [t] Fear not to serve the Chaldeans: dwell in the land, and serve the king of Babylon, and it shall be well with you.

10 As for me, behold, I will dwell at Mispah, to § serve the Chaldeans which will come unto us: but ye, [u] gather ye wine, and [x] summer-fruits, and oil, and put them in your vessels, and dwell in your cities that ye have taken.

gives encouragement to his people, according to their perils, fears, and trials; and will never suffer those to be confounded or perish who trust in his mercy and obey his commandments. And if it be a great favour for those, who live in perilous times, to have their life given them for a prey; what cause shall we have for gratitude, if we escape the temptations, and are carried through the trials, of this evil world, and finally obtain the eternal salvation of our souls!

NOTES.

CHAP. XL. V. 1. The word, &c. This is rather the title of the subsequent part of the book, than of what follows in this chapter, which is wholly historical. It seems that Jeremiah, after he had been freed from prison, continued among the Jews, till he was bound with others of them, and carried to Ramah; and that he was there again set at liberty, in the manner here related.

V. 2, 3. The Jews were so blinded, that they could not see, or would not acknowledge, the hand of God in these events, or that they were the punishment of their sins. But this Gentile evidently perceived it: and perhaps he thought, that this justified all the violence and cruelty which he and the Chaldeans had committed.

V. 6. It is doubtful whether Jeremiah acted prudently in this decision: the event seems to indicate the contrary. He had received no intimations from God, that the Jews should prosper again in their own land, till seventy years were expired. But he was influenced by love to the promised land and to the remnant of his people; and he preferred the hopes of doing them good, to any favour that could have been shown him in Babylon.

y xxiv. 9. Is. xvi. 4. Ez. v. 3. 12.

11 Likewise when [y] all the Jews that were in Moab, and among the Ammonites, and in Edom, and that were in all the countries, heard that the king of Babylon had left a remnant of Judah, and that he had set over them Gedaliah the son of Ahikam the son of Shaphan;

12 Even all the Jews returned out of all places whither they were driven, and came to the land of Judah, to Gedaliah, unto Mispah, and gathered wine and summer-fruits very much.

13 ¶ Moreover [z] Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces that were in the fields, came to Gedaliah to Mizpah,

14 And said unto him, Dost thou certainly know, that Baalis the king of the Ammonites hath sent [b] Ishmael the son of Nethaniah to *slay thee? But Gedaliah the son of Ahikam [c] believed them not.

f xli 2. Matt. x. 16, 17. Rom. iii. 8.

V. 7—12. (xxvi. 24.) Perhaps Gedaliah had before surrendered to the Chaldeans; or by some services, or his general character for integrity and capacity, he had recommended himself to the confidence of the victors. It was not their intention entirely to desolate the land: and therefore they wished to induce the poor remains of the Jews to settle there; as they feared no further resistance, now Jerusalem lay in ruins, and their rulers and nobles were either slain or made captives. They therefore placed Gedaliah over them, to encourage them to settle and cultivate their lands. Accordingly he fixed his residence at Mizpah: and many of those, who had commanded bodies of troops in different parts of the land, and who had fled into the adjacent countries, now repaired to Gedaliah, with some hopes of enjoying peace and acquiring a settlement. Gedaliah seems to have been an upright man and a cordial friend to his people, and well approved by them. (Marg. Ref.) He encouraged them to expect protection from the Chaldeans, whilst they continued in quiet subjection: he engaged with a solemn oath not to injure or oppress them, but to do them all the service in his power: and he excited them to make all the provision they could for their wants, by collecting such of the fruits of the earth as had escaped the ravages of war. Accordingly their numbers increased; they found great abundance of provisions; and they had a fair prospect of again prospering, had not their unrepented wickedness entailed divine judgments on them.

—Serve. (10.) Or stand before the Chaldeans, as a mediator.

V. 13—16. Johanan and his companions seem to have acted honestly in this affair. They had received certain intelligence of the plot formed against Gedaliah's life, and consequently against the whole new settlement. Ishmael, (whose very name seemed hostile to Israel,) being a branch of David's family, was perhaps displeased that another was preferred above him. And the king of the Ammonites, (as it seems, out of hatred to the Jews,) employed him to slay Gedaliah. But Gedaliah meaning honestly, was too unsuspecting: and as Johanan proposed a violent method of defeating Ishmael's design, it is probable that he considered the information as malicious. Yet he certainly ought to have examined into the evidence, and to have confined Ishmael; or to have taken some precautions for his own safety, on which that of the people so much depended. But he was left to this indiscretion, that judgment might come to the uttermost on this incorrigible remnant of Jews.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Many can see the justice of God's judgments, and the truth of his words, in the case of others, who are heedless or blind as to those things which relate to themselves. Nay, some can plead the prophecies, in vindication of their own cruel oppressions, and think themselves justified, because the scripture is fulfilled; though it was equally fulfilled by the treachery of Judas and the malice of those who crucified Christ! None, however, are so hardened as apostate professors of religion. It is allowable for faithful ministers to receive the proffered kindness even of ungodly men, when it can be done without appearance of selfishness; when it does not tend to deceive the giver; and when it is not to be purchased or repaid by any sinful compliances or flatteries. Nay, their counsel may be often taken in secular matters: for they are "wise in their "generation." They who earnestly desire the salvation of sinners and the prosperity of the church, are apt to take encouragement, from transient appearances, to expect better times: and they prefer the hope of being useful, to the most secure and profitable situations, in which they would be shut out from God's ordinances, and waste their lives to no purpose. After heavy calamities, men might obtain peace and comfort, if they would but submit to Providence, and to those placed over them; if they accommodated themselves to their circumstances, and applied themselves with diligence, quietness, and honesty, to the duties of their station; and, especially, if they did but repent of their sins, and seek peace with God and protection from him. But his wrath pursueth the impenitent into every place and condition: and whilst pride, ambition, avarice, or revenge, bear rule, men will form new projects, and be restless in mischief, which commonly ends in their

CHAP. XLI.

Ishmael treacherously murders Gedaliah and many others; and attempts to lead the rest to the Ammonites, 1—10. Johanan rescues them, drives away Ishmael, takes the command, and purposes to go into Egypt, 11—18.

NOW it came to pass [a] in the seventh month, that [b] Ishmael the son of Nethaniah the son of Elishama, of the seed royal, and the princes of the king, even ten men with him, came unto Gedaliah the son of Ahikam to Mizpah; [c] and there they did eat bread together in Mizpah.

2 Then arose Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, and [d] the ten men that were with him, and [e] smote Gedaliah the son of Ahikam the son of Shaphan with the sword, and slew him, [f] whom the king of Babylon had made governor over the land.

3 Ishmael also [g] slew all the Jews that were with him, even with Gedaliah, at Mizpah, and the Chaldeans that were found there, and the men of war.

4 And it came to pass, [h] the second day after he had slain Gedaliah, and no man knew it,

5 That there [i] came certain from [k] Shechem, from [l] Shiloh, and from [m] Samaria, even fourscore men, having [n] their beards shaven, and their clothes rent, and having cut themselves; with offerings and incense in their hand, to bring them [o] to the house of the LORD.

6 And Ishmael the son of Nethaniah went forth from Mizpah to meet them, * weeping all along as he went: and it came to pass, as he met them, he said unto them, Come to Gedaliah the son of Ahikam.

7 And it was so, when they came into the midst of the city, that Ishmael the son of Nethaniah [p] slew them, and cast them into the midst of the pit, he, and the men that were with him.

8 But ten men were found among them, that said unto Ishmael, [q] Slay us not; for we have treasures in the field, of wheat, and of barley, and of oil, and of honey. So he forbare, and slew them not among their brethren.

own ruin and that of others. Advancement above such as were equals or superiors always excites envy and opposition: and no equity, kindness, or services, can afford security from the assaults of turbulent enmity and disappointed ambition. —When men mean well, they are often too free from suspicion: and even information and good counsel, when given with violence and connected with unjustifiable proposals, will often be rejected by conscientious persons. We have, however, need to be wise as serpents, as well as harmless as doves; not only for our own preservation, but to prevent "one sinner from destroying much good." But we should especially learn to trust in God alone; as the most powerful earthly protectors cannot secure us from the base designs of even very mean and inconsiderable enemies.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLI. V. 1. Seventh, &c. Three months after the temple was destroyed. The fast in the seventh month was observed in remembrance of the murder of Gedaliah. (Marg. Ref.)

—Princes. 'Some of the chief officers belonging to 'Zedekiah. (xxxvi. 12.) These brought a great number 'of others with them as their retinue; or else they could 'not have made such destruction as they did.' (Lowth.)— These "princes of the king" might join with Ishmael, from hatred to the Chaldeans, as well as envy of Gedaliah.

V. 2, 3. Gedaliah was evidently imprudent in taking no precaution against a person, whom he had great reason to suspect, both as a rival, and on account of the caution which Johanan had given him: but his unsuspecting generosity aggravated the baseness of Ishmael's conduct. Had not the other captains been infatuated, either by envy, resentment, or by a selfish regard to their private concerns, they would have been more careful in defending a life on which the safety of the whole company so greatly depended. —Ishmael, by coming to Gedaliah, had virtually submitted to his authority and claimed his protection; and he was at this time, along with his friends, hospitably entertained by Gedaliah. Yet he slew 'all that joined with Gedaliah in 'opposing him: for several of the commanders, as well 'as the greatest part of the people, were still left alive, as 'it appears by the sequel.' (Lowth.) Many of these, however, seem to have been absent from Mizpah at this time, gathering in the fruits of the earth, or attending to their private concerns; so that all present, that stood out in resistance, seem to have been slain; and the rest kept in close confinement, that the transaction might be concealed, till Ishmael had completed his designs.

V. 4—8. The care which had been taken to conceal the murder of Gedaliah, &c. gave Ishmael an opportunity of still further increasing the number and atrocity of his crimes. The places here mentioned had belonged to the kingdom of Israel: but they lay not far from Mizpah; and it is probable, that these men were Jews, who had resorted to Gedaliah, and confiding in his protection, had fixed their residence in different places, in order to gather in the fruits of the earth. They expressed their grief for the calamities of the nation, by some observances which 9 Now the pit wherein Ishmael had cast all the dead bodies of the men, whom he had slain * because of Gedaliah, was it which [r] Asa the king had made, [s] for fear of Baasha king of Israel: and Ishmael the son of Nethaniah filled it with them that were slain.

10 Then Ishmael carried away captive [t] all the residue of the people that were in Mizpah, [u] even the king's daughters, and all the people that remained in Mizpah, whom Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard had committed to Gedaliah the son of Ahikam: and Ishmael the son of Nethaniah carried them away captive, and departed to go over [x] to the Ammonites.

11 ¶ But when [y] Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces that were with him, heard of all the evil that Ishmael the son of Nethaniah had done, 12 Then they took all the men, and went [z] to fight with Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, and found him by [a] the great waters that are in Gibeon.

13 Now it came to pass, that when all the people, which were with Ishmael, saw Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces that were with him, then they were glad.

14 So all the people that Ishmael had carried away captive from Mizpah cast about and returned, and went unto Johanan the son of Kareah.

15 But Ishmael the son of Nethaniah [b] escaped from Johanan with [c] eight men, and went to the Ammonites.

16 Then took Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces that were with him, all the remnant of the people, whom he had recovered from Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, from Mizpah, (after that he had slain Gedaliah the son of Ahikam,) [d] even mighty men of war, and the women, and the children, and the eunuchs, whom he had brought again from Gibeon:

17 And they departed, and dwelt in the habitation of [e] Chimham, which is by Bethlehem, [f] to go to enter into Egypt, 18 Because of the Chaldeans: [g] for they were afraid of them, Because Ishmael the son of Nethaniah had slain Gedaliah the son of Ahikam, [h] whom the king of Babylon made governor in the land.

were forbidden in the law, on funeral occasions; (Marg Ref.) but which were customary, and perhaps counted allowable, in seasons of public calamity. Some think, that Gedaliah, after the destruction of the temple, had erected an altar, and appointed a temporary place of worship at Mizpah, to which they purposed to carry their offerings; but it is more likely, that they meant to show their regard to the ruins of the temple, and there to offer their oblations, as well as the circumstances would admit. —The hypocrisy of Ishmael, in pretending to share their sorrows, and inviting them to see Gedaliah; and then murdering a company of men who gave him no provocation, without sparing any but those who appealed to his avarice, when added to his other crimes, constituted a complication of atrocious wickedness, which has scarcely ever been exceeded. Perhaps he hoped at first to have won them over to his party; but perceiving their attachment to Gedaliah, he thus wreaked his vengeance on them.

V. 9. Pit. Asa fortified Mizpah; and in doing this, he would make trenches as well as ramparts: but perhaps this pit was some hiding-place, which he prepared for security, in case Baasha should suddenly assault him. (Marg. Ref.) (Notes, 2 Chr. xvi.)

V. 10. Perhaps Ishmael had at first hoped that the Jews would have joined him: and that by the help of the king of Ammon, he should be able to make a stand against the Chaldeans, who had withdrawn most of their forces from that neighbourhood. But he now despaired of success in that way; and proceeded to carry the whole unarmed multitude captive into the land of Ammon. Among them, it seems, there were some daughters of king Zedekiah, who had been left to the care of Gedaliah, when his sons were slain; and these, being recovered from Ishmael by Johanan, went down with him into Egypt, and seem to have perished there with the other Jews.

V. 11—15. Johanan seems to have been employed, at a distance from Gedaliah: so that it was some time before he heard tidings of these tragical events. But when he was informed of them, he immediately pursued Ishmael, who had not courage to face him; and being left by those whom he had detained as prisoners, he escaped the avenging sword of Johanan. Ishmael came to Gedaliah with ten men, who are supposed to have been princes of Judah, with their retinues: but he fled with only eight men. Perhaps the others had before left him, or had lost their lives in these bloody transactions: and, if they had retainers, these might think it safer to join Johanan, than to accompany Ishmael in his flight.

V. 16—18. Johanan had hitherto acted right: and it was proper that he should assume the command, till the king of Babylon had been informed. But he and the other princes, having taken a decided part against Ishmael, had no sufficient reason to fear lest the Chaldeans would revenge the murder of Gedaliah on them. Perhaps Joha-nan had no mind to be superseded in the command; and so used his influence to induce the whole company to take refuge in Egypt; and their old attachment to the Egyptians rendered them the more ready to concur in this ruinous measure. "The habitation of Chimham" seems to have been a residence and estate, which David had settled on Chimham the son of Barzillai, out of his own patrimony. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When God is provoked to leave men to themselves and to the temptations of Satan, they are hurried on into every kind of wickedness; their impetuous passions burst through all restraints, and misery and destruction attend their ways. While divine judgments are executing on guilty nations, the best men are often first cut off, for the punishment of the survivors. Candour and generosity frequently expose men to be base designs of those wretches, who are of their father the devil, and closely copy his example of subtlety, malice, and murder. They, who hate the worshippers of God, can assume the appearance of piety and love, that they may better accomplish their purposes: and the thirst for blood, like other depraved appetites, becomes more insatiable by every gratification, until men delight in murder for its own sake. It is sometimes well for mankind, that one selfish passion restrains another in the conduct of those who are not influenced by a better motive. Thus avarice checks the progress of cruelty; ambition and pride that of licentiousness; the love of licentious pleasures that of avarice, ambition, and revenge; and the fear of consequences restrains all the other selfish passions. By these and such like means the Lord bounds and over-rules the wickedness of ungodly men; and provides for the accomplishment of his own wise designs, whether of judgment or of mercy. As death in such varied forms meets men in those places where they least expect it, we should continually inquire, whether we be in such a state and frame of mind, as we should wish to be found in when called to appear before our Judge? And as men readily give all their substance to ransom their lives, how ready should we be to forsake all for the salvation of our souls! If our hearts delight in the ordinances of God, and are disposed to sympathize in the afflictions of his people, and to regard the interests of true religion as our interests, death can do us no harm; but will remove us to that happy place, where all tears will be wiped from our eyes. They who are most savage in their cruelty to those that are not prepared to resist them, are often most cowardly when vigorously opposed. The success of villany must be short lived: and though base murderers and traitors may for a time escape vengeance, yet evil pursueth, and will certainly overtake them. But how soon may our most promising appearances of worldly prosperity vanish as a dream! And how impossible is it, that any can prosper, who harden their hearts against God! The removal of a prudent, peaceable, and equitable ruler, and the succession of another, who is rash, turbulent, and enterprising, may affect the condition of vast multitudes; so entirely do we in every thing depend on the providence of God! When men's hearts are fixed on worldly projects and connexions, they will soon pretend or fancy some motive or reason for following their inclinations. And if the fear of man sometimes restrains from evil, it more frequently leads to rebellion and impiety. But they only are happy and steady, who fear the Lord, and walk in his ways.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLII. V. 1—6. We are not informed by what means Jeremiah escaped the sword of Ishmael: but the Lord took care of him according to his promises. The princes seem to have neglected him; till, on this occasion,

7 ¶ And it came to pass [p] after ten days, that the word of the LORD came unto Jeremiah.

8 Then called he [q] Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces which were with him, and all the people, from the least even to the greatest,

9 And said unto them, Thus saith the LORD, the God of Israel, [r] unto whom ye sent me to present your supplication before him;

10 If ye will still abide in this land, [s] then will I build you, and not pull you down; and I will plant you, and not pluck you up: for [t] I repent me of the evil that I have done unto you.

11 Be not [u] afraid of the king of Babylon, of whom ye are afraid; be not afraid of him, saith the LORD: [x] for I am with you to save you, and to deliver you from his hand.

12 And I will shew mercies unto you, [y] that he may have mercy upon you, and cause you to return to your own land.

13 But [z] if ye say, We will not dwell in this land, neither obey the voice of the LORD your God;

14 Saying, No; but [a] we will go into the land of Egypt, where we shall see no war; nor hear the sound of the trumpet, nor have hunger of bread; and there will we dwell:

15 And now therefore hear the word of the LORD, ye remnant of Judah, Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; [b] If ye wholly set your faces to enter into Egypt, and go to sojourn there;

16 Then it shall come to pass, [c] that the sword, which ye feared, shall overtake you there in the land of Egypt, and the famine, whereof ye were afraid, shall * follow close after you there in Egypt; and [d] there ye shall die.

17 So shall † it be with all the men that set their faces to go into Egypt to sojourn there; [e] they shall die by the sword, by the famine, and by the pestilence: and [f] none of them shall remain or escape from the evil that I will bring upon them.

18 For thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; [g] As mine anger and my fury hath been poured forth upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem; so shall my fury be poured forth upon you, when ye shall enter into Egypt; and [h] ye shall be an execration, and an astonishment, and a curse, and a reproach; [i] and ye shall see this place no more.

they wanted to have his sanction to their purpose of going to Egypt. In order to induce him to favour them, they applied to him with one consent, and in the most respectful and plausible manner; they used language suited to prepossess him with a favourable opinion of them, and to move his compassion; and they entreated his prayers in their behalf, and that he would inquire of the Lord what he would have them to do. The prophet readily acquiesced; and doubted not but he should receive an answer from God, which he would unreservedly declare to them. And they called the Lord to witness, that they would implicitly follow his directions, whatever they were, that it might be well with them. When they said, "Whether it be good, "or whether it be bad;" they used language, which implied, that they supposed Jeremiah would answer according to his own discretion, rather than that he would deliver the unerring counsel of God. 'It is the constant me-'thod of hypocrites, to pretend a profound submission to 'the will of God, till that comes to cross their inclinations 'or interest.' (Lowth.)

V. 7. The prophet waited for a revelation from God, in answer to the inquiries of the people, who saw good to delay for some time to make known his will: perhaps to show them, that Jeremiah did not speak of his own mind, but when, and as he was directed. The delay was also suited to give time for consideration, and to retard the execution of their rash projects: and as it would render them impatient, it tended to detect their hypocrisy, and to show more clearly their determined rebellion against God.

V. 10. I repent, &c. The Lord was ready to alter his conduct towards the people, provided they would obey his voice. He delighted not in their miseries, but was ready to terminate them, as soon as it could consist with his justice and the honour of his name. 'God is said to 'repent, when he alters the outward methods of his pro-'vidence. The punishment, which the Jews had received, 'had made satisfaction to his justice, as far as concerns 'this world; and he would not continue the same severity, 'unless they gave him a new provocation.' (Lowth.)

V. 13. 'I will incline the king of Babylon to take 'pity on you; and so settle you in your own country.' (Lowth.) He should cause them to return to their cities and inheritances; and not live in that unsettled manner which they then did.

V. 14—17. 'Thus God turneth the policy of the 'wicked to their own destruction: for they thought them-'selves safe in Egypt; and there Nebuchadnezzar des-'troyed them and the Egyptians.'

V. 18. The people had witnessed the tremendous effects of the wrath of God, in the siege and destruction of Jerusalem: and had they not been past feeling, this denunciation must have made their ears to tingle, and appalled their very souls. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 20—22. God made known to the prophet the dissimulation of the princes and people; and their conduct when he delivered his message, seems to have indicated a determination to disobey it. He did not therefore shun to charge the matter home on their consciences, and to denounce the awful judgments of God against them; though they had shown him much respect, and had him entirely in their power.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Numbers have a general persuasion, that the instructions given them from the word of God are right and good; but they do not so decidedly believe them, as to yield obedience, when self-denial is requisite: yet they wish faithful ministers to sanction their measures, and in urgent cases desire an interest in their prayers. Many of them learn the language of piety, and can upon occasion use it very plausibly: they pretend great respect for the servants of God, and become their supplicants, for their own selfish purposes; they impose upon them, and recommend themselves to their compassion and good will; and make them think, that they desire to "know the way in which they "should walk, and the thing that they should do." There is, however, no harm done, if ministers entertain better hopes of men than they deserve; provided they be only induced to pray for them, and to declare the word of God without reserve or discouragement: for they should on all occasions be ready to do this for every one, whether great or small. But many, who promise with great solemnity to do whatever the Lord requires, whilst they can hope to have their pride flattered, and their favourite inclinations gratified, cannot endure to be contradicted or called to exercise self-denial: and generally something in the language of such persons betrays the state of their hearts to those who have "their senses exercised to discern good "and evil." For how could men, if they were not greatly attached to their own wills, suppose that the Lord would require of them any thing evil in itself, or prejudicial to them? All his commands are holy, just, and good, however they may thwart our inclinations: and not only will it be well with us at last, if we obey the voice of the Lord our God, but "in keeping of his precepts "there is great reward." They that would know the mind of God in doubtful cases, must wait as well as pray. He that believeth will not be hasty, but will stay till he is satisfied, or obliged to decide: but unbelief and self-will are impatient; and the Lord often delays to answer prayer, that he may distinguish betwixt the humble believer, who must wait at mercy's door till it be opened; and the pretender, who (like Saul) will soon apply elsewhere, if he find not the encouragement and success that he expected. It is as vain as impious, to attempt imposing upon God. He will, however, always give encouragement to sinners, who apply for it in his appointed way. He is ever ready to return in mercy to those whom he hath afflicted, and to pardon the penitent; for he delighteth not in the death of a sinner, but rather that he should repent and live: and he never rejects those who rely on his promises and obey his commandments. Whatever loss or suffering we may sustain from obedience, it is provided against in his word; and he hath engaged to protect and deliver all who trust and serve him. But if men will not abide in his counsel, nor obey his voice; if they will lean to their own understandings, instead of trusting in his guidance; if they will expect security from trouble and danger by disobedience, and obstinately pursue their carnal projects: either the evils they feared, or far worse, will come upon them, from which they will not be able to escape. And they, who copy the crimes of those on whom the anger and fury of the Lord hath been poured out, will in their turn also be made an execration, an astonishment, a curse, and a reproach. These things must be urged on the consciences of men, without respect of persons: nor must the servants of God shun to declare his counsel, out of regard to their rank, fear of their frown, or even gratitude for the favours conferred on themselves. But no sinners should be rebuked with such sharpness, as they who have dissembled with God in their solemn professions and inquiries after his will. This will appear in their conduct, for actions speak more plainly than words: and when it is thus made manifest, that they will not obey the voice of God, they must be plainly told that his wrath abideth on them.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLIII. V. 2, 3. Azariah, called Jezaniah. (xlii. 1.)

Proud men. 'Who refused to obey almighty God, 'when his command crossed their inclinations.'

—Hath not spoken. 'The constant method of hypocrites and infidels, who pretend that they are not satisfied 'of the truth of divine revelation; when the true cause of 'their unbelief is, that God's commands contradict their 'own lusts and appetites.'

Baruch. 'They would not directly accuse Jeremiah; '—but they lay the blame on Baruch.' (Lowth.) The princes had previously made up their minds, at all events, to go into Egypt; and therefore they were of course decidedly averse to Jeremiah's counsel, because proudly attached to their own will and wisdom; and doubtless they were also exasperated by his severe language and awful warnings. They were not, however, willing to allow, that they acted in direct defiance of God's authority; they pretended, therefore, and perhaps persuaded themselves, that Jeremiah was influenced by Baruch to oppose their projects, that they might fall into the hands of the Chaldeans. Their suspicions of Baruch were doubtless ill-grounded; for he was a very pious man, and a steady friend to his people: but Jeremiah's character was so established, he had so long shown a patient disinterested love to his nation, and so many of his predictions had already been fulfilled; that their accusation of him was as foolish as it was malicious. His late preference of a lot among them, to the favour of the king and princes of Babylon, was alone a sufficient confutation of the slander.

V. 5—7. Johanan and the captains and soldiers seem to have compelled the people in general, as well as Jeremiah and Baruch, to accompany them into Egypt. This aggravated their impiety and rebellion; as they carried away those into that idolatrous country, (which had always proved treacherous to Israel,) who had returned from other nations out of affection to the land of Judah. When they arrived in Egypt, they repaired immediately to the royal city, where, it is probable, they were favourably received by Pharaoh.

V. 8—13. The Jews had sheltered themselves in Egypt, to be out of the reach of the Chaldeans: but they were no sooner arrived there, than the prophet was instructed to inform them, that Nebuchadnezzar would pursue them, and that Pharaoh would not be able to protect them. This prediction was attended by a sign, that it might be the more noticed. It was also predicted that Nebuchadnezzar would destroy great numbers of the Egyptians, and take many of them prisoners; that he would add Egypt to his dominions, and possess himself of the spoil of it, with the utmost speed, with as much ease as a shepherd puts on his garment. 'This shows the prodigious 'ease with which all the power and riches of a kingdom 'are carried away; when God appoints the revolution.' (Rollin:) That he would return to his own land in peace, none daring to resist him: and that he would burn their temples and idols, to which the Egyptians were attached beyond other nations, and which tempted the Jews also to idolatry. And especially that he would break the images of Beth-shemesh, (the house of the sun,) in the land of Egypt; for there was a city of that name in the land of Judah. (Jos. xv. 10. Notes, xlvi. 13—26. Ez. xxix. 1—12.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Pride is the great root of infidelity, and proud men scorn subjection to any superior; they prefer their own wisdom to the revealed word of God; they resent warning, counsel, and reproof; they set up their own will in opposition to divine authority, and justify themselves in the most flagrant enormities. When such men have resolved not to be ruled by the Scriptures, they deny their divine original, notwithstanding the manifold demonstrations with which they are authenticated: they can give credit to any absurdity, which seems to countenance infidelity; they impute the basest conduct to the most blameless and excellent characters, and the most unexceptionable actions to the vilest motives. But they express most enmity against faithful ministers, whom they treat as deceivers, and charge with malevolence and with being enemies to mankind. When thus bent upon disobedience, they employ their ability, influence, or authority, in carrying others along with them in their rebellious courses: and the prospect of success or carnal security easily leads them into the most powerful temptations. But vengeance pursueth the obstinate rebel; while no banishment, or distance from external advantages, can exclude God's people from his presence and the comfort of communion with him.—When he employs ambitious men to scourge guilty nations, they have easy and speedy success in their destructive expeditions; but he will especially punish those, who deceive, ensnare, or tempt his people to rebellion against him.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLIV. V. 1. The Jews were now dispersed in different cities, probably according to the appointment of Pharaoh; and there they worshipped idols without restraint. Jeremiah was therefore commissioned to deliver a message from God to them; which he seems to have done at Pathros, to a multitude there assembled, (15;) but it would soon be circulated among those, who lived in the other cities.

—Noph. 'Commonly called Memphis; near this place 'stands one of the pyramids, which is yet remaining.' (Lowth.) 'These were all famous and strong cities in 'Egypt, where the Jews that were fled dwelt for their 'safety: but the prophet declareth that there is no hold so 'strong, as to preserve them from God's vengeance.' (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2, 3. The God of Israel had given so many proofs of his wisdom and power, his justice, truth, and mercy, in his dealings with that nation, during a long succession of ages, that nothing but wilfully closing their eyes could prevent the Jews from knowing him to be the one living and true God. But they could assign no good reason for worshipping idols: they knew not that they had any existence: and they could not but know, that the images which they made of them were nothing else than lifeless wood, metal, or stone.

V. 4. (Marg. Ref.) The latter clause may be rendered, "I pray you, do not that abominable thing which I "hate." The language is peculiarly pathetic, as well as emphatical. (2 Cor. v. 20.)

V. 6. 'He setteth before their eyes God's judgments 'against Judah and Jerusalem for their idolatry; that they 'might beware by their example, and not with the like 'wickedness provoke the Lord.'

V. 9. 'We ought to keep in memory God's plagues, 'from the beginning; that, considering them, we might 'live in his fear: and know that if he spared not kings, 'princes, and rulers, or whole countries and nations, for 'their sins, we vile worms cannot look to escape punish-'ment for ours.'

V. 12. Set their faces. 'They have fully set their 'minds, and are gone thither on purpose. Whereby he 'excepteth the innocent, as Jeremiah and Baruch, that 'were forced. Therefore the Lord showeth, that he will 'set his face against them; that is, purposely destroy 'them.'

V. 14. 'Scaliger observes, out of Eusebius, that Ar-'taxerxes Ochus, making an expedition into Egypt, 'removed a considerable number of Jews out of that 'country, and carried them away as far as the Caspian 'sea, and there settled them. These, he thinks, were 'the remainder of those Jews that went down into Egypt 'at this time.' (Lowth.) As, however, Ochus' conquest of Egypt did not occur till nearly three hundred years from the time of the Jews going into Egypt, this opinion is not very probable: nor do we read any thing more of this remnant, or of the fulfilment of this prediction.

None shall, &c. The Jews, when they went into Egypt, supposed, that they might more easily return into their land, than their brethren at Babylon could; and they had a desire of returning, provided they might but be secured from the Chaldeans. But the Lord declared that none of them should return thither, "but such as should escape:" which may mean such as should escape the contagion of idolatry; or a very mean and small remnant, escaping with immense difficulty from the general ruin. (28.) 'None shall return into the land of Judah, but such 'as shall speedily withdraw themselves out of Egypt, 'and make an escape from this wicked Johanan.' (Bp. Hall.) Perhaps some of the small remnant, who went into Egypt by compulsion, being preserved from idolatry, were afterwards restored, with their posterity, as "a rem-"nant according to the election of grace," to their own land, when the Jews returned from Babylon.

15 ¶ Then [k] all the men, which knew that their wives had burned incense unto other gods, and all the women that stood by, a great multitude, even all the people that dwelt in the land of Egypt, in Pathros, answered Jeremiah, saying,

16 As for the word that thou hast spoken unto us in the name of the LORD, [l] we will not hearken unto thee.

17 But we will certainly do [m] whatsoever thing goeth forth out of our own mouth, to burn incense unto the * queen of heaven, and to pour out drink-offerings unto her, [n] as we have done, we, and [o] our fathers, our kings, and our princes, [p] in the cities of Judah, and in the streets of Jerusalem: for [q] then had we plenty of † victuals, and were well, and saw no evil.

18 But since we left off to burn incense to the queen of heaven, and to pour out drink-offerings unto her, [r] we have wanted all things, and have been consumed by the sword, and by the famine.

19 And when [s] we burned incense to the queen of heaven, and poured out drink-offerings unto her, did we make her cakes to worship her, and pour out drink-offerings unto her, [t] without our ‡ men?

20 Then Jeremiah said unto all the people, to the men, and to the women, and to all the people which had given him that answer, saying,

21 The incense that ye burned in the cities of Judah, and in the streets of Jerusalem, ye, and your fathers, your kings, and your princes, and the people of the land, [u] did not the LORD remember them, and came it not into his mind?

22 So that the LORD [x] could no longer bear, because of the evils of your doings and because of the abominations which ye have committed; therefore is [y] your land a desolation, and an astonishment, and a curse, without an inhabitant, as at this day.

23 Because [z] ye have burned incense, and because ye have sinned against the LORD, and have not obeyed the voice of the LORD, nor walked in his law, nor in his statutes, nor in his testimonies; therefore this evil is happened unto you as at this day.

24 Moreover Jeremiah said unto all the people, and to all the women, [a] Hear the word of the LORD, [b] all Judah that are in the land of Egypt:

25 Thus saith the LORD of hosts the God of Israel, saying, [c] Ye and your wives have both spoken with your mouths, and fulfilled with your hand, saying, [d] We will surely perform our vows that we have vowed, to burn incense to the queen of heaven, and to pour out drink-offerings

V. 15—18. The women had, it seems, been more active in idolatry than the men; yet the men were enraged at the prophet's rebuke, and were determined to justify what their wives had done. After many evasions and excuses for their disobedience, they at length spake out in the most impious manner, declaring that they would not regard the word, which the prophet had spoken to them in the name of God. Either they meant to treat Jeremiah as a false prophet; or they were avowed in infidelity and impiety: they thought the service of JEHOVAH unprofitable and ruinous, and were determined to have no more to do with it. They had vowed to burn incense to idols, and they would do that which had gone out of their mouth, (Marg. Ref.) This worship, they averred, had been of great antiquity and authority; for their fathers, and their kings and princes, had sanctioned it, not only in the cities of Judah, but in Jerusalem itself: when this worship was observed, they had prospered; but since it had been put down, all their miseries had come upon them. Nothing could be more irrational than this pretence: for the prophets, who had reprobated their idolatry, had also predicted their calamities; and they, who had favoured it, had promised them peace and prosperity. Indeed, the Lord had long borne with them, till at length their measure of iniquity was filled; and then he executed vengeance upon them, because they cleaved in heart to their idols, even when they had it not in their power to worship them. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 19. This is supposed to have been the answer of the women, who took the prophet's rebuke to themselves, and were offended at him for it; (15;) and they pleaded, that they had not performed their worship, without the knowledge and connivance of their husbands: yet as the masculine is used, it seems the men concurred in it. 'This 'showeth how great danger it is for the husbands to per- 'mit their wives any thing, whereof they be not assured 'by God's word; for thereby they take occasion to justify 'their doings; and then husbands shall give an account 'thereof before God.'

V. 22. Could, &c. As men, when urged by repeated provocations, are no longer able to repress their anger, but it bursts forth most violently on the objects of their resentment; so the Lord could no longer endure the provocations of his people; but his honour required him to take vengeance on them, and then the effects of his indignation became very dreadful.

unto her: ye will surely accomplish your vows, and surely perform your vows.

26 Therefore hear ye the word of the LORD, all Judah that dwell in the land of Egypt; Behold, [c] I have sworn by my great name, saith the LORD, [f] that my name shall no more be named in the mouth of any man of Judah in all the land of Egypt, saying, [g] The LORD GOD liveth.

27 Behold, I [h] will watch over them for evil, and not for good; and all the men of Judah, that are in the land of Egypt, [i] shall be consumed by the sword and by the famine, until there be an end of them.

28 Yet [k] a small number that escape the sword shall return out of the land of Egypt into the land of Judah, and all the remnant of Judah, that are gone into the land of Egypt to sojourn there, shall know whose word shall stand, * mine, or theirs.

29 And this shall be [m] a sign unto you, saith the LORD, that I will punish you in this place, that ye may know that my words shall surely stand against you for evil:

30 Thus saith the LORD; Behold, [n] I will give Pharaoh-hophra king of Egypt into the hand of his enemies, and into the hand of them that seek his life, [o] as I gave Zedekiah king of Judah into the hand of Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon, his enemy, and that sought his life.

V. 25. 'They insist upon their unlawful vow, as an 'obligation in conscience which could not be dispensed 'with; just as Herod did on his unlawful oath.' (Matt. xiv. 9.) (Lowth.)

V. 26. 'I have made a solemn vow in opposition to 'that wicked one of yours. I will consume them by a sud- 'den and general destruction; and will deliver them up to 'impenitence and apostacy.' (Lowth.)

My name, &c. The Jews, amidst their idolatries, professed themselves the people of JEHOVAH, and would sometimes swear by his name; but he solemnly assured them that he would so destroy them that none of them should remain in the land of Egypt to dishonour his name by this hypocritical use of it. This must be understood of that rebellious company: for multitudes of Jews in after ages settled in Egypt, and openly professed and exercised their religion there.

V. 28. The word rendered that escape, is translated by the Septuagint by the same word which St. Luke uses, when speaking of the success of the Gospel. "The "Lord added to the Church daily such as should be saved," or the saved ones. (Note, 14.)

Shall know. 'Since they are so peremptory in abiding 'by their own vows and resolutions, they shall see whose 'word shall stand good, or take effect, mine or theirs.' (Lowth.) The people rejected the Lord's word of warning, of precept, and of promise; but his word of threatening stood out against them, and would certainly be executed. They established their own word, by performing their rebellious purposes; but they would not find their words take place, with which they promised themselves, and each other, impunity and prosperity in their ungodliness. The event would in this respect show whose words would stand, the Lord's or theirs.

V. 29, 30. (Notes, xliii. 8—13.) Pharaoh-hophra, (called Apries by the Greek historians,) after long prosperity, which elated him with the most excessive pride and arrogance, was dethroned in an insurrection headed by Amasis, who succeeded him: and having concealed himself for a few years, he collected some forces, marched against Amasis, and gave him battle, in which being vanquished, and taken prisoner, he was strangled in his own palace. Thus he was "given into the hands of his enemies, and of those "who sought his life," as Zedekiah had been. In the time which intervened between Pharaoh-hophra's being dethroned and his death, Nebuchadnezzar invaded Egypt; and having made immense destruction of the inhabitants, and taken a prodigious booty, he came to terms with Amasis, confirmed him in the kingdom as his deputy, and returned to Babylon; whither he is supposed to have taken those Jews who survived the sword, or who were not slain by the enraged conqueror.—These events are computed to have occurred between the fourteenth and the nineteenth year of the captivity, (Notes, xlvi. 13—26. Ez. xxix. xxxii.) (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—14.

We ought frequently to recollect the miseries which we have witnessed or heard of; seriously considering that the Lord hath brought them upon the sufferers, because of the wickedness which they committed to provoke him to anger. For sin is that abominable thing which he hateth; and every wilful transgression implies alienation of heart from him, as well as rebellion against him. But, though all our sorrows originate from this source, yet the most awful miseries, to which men are exposed, are occasioned by their neglect of his great salvation. For, after all that he hath done to open a new and living Way for sinners to return to him, the warnings, exhortations, and entreaties of his ministers often prove unavailing, and numbers remain unwilling to be reconciled unto God: they still persist in those abominable things which he hateth; they will not incline their ears or their hearts, to return to his worship and service; and their obstinate impenitence and unbelief are evils committed against their own souls; their blood is upon their own heads, and they cut themselves off, and make themselves a curse and a reproach. To mingle idolatry with divine worship, and to reject the mediation of Christ, are 3 Thou didst say, [e] Woe is me now! for the LORD hath [f] added grief to my sorrow; [g] I fainted in my sighing, and I find no rest.

5 And [i] seekest thou great things for thyself? seek them not: for, behold, [k] I will bring evil upon all flesh, saith the LORD: but [l] thy life will I give unto thee for a prey, in all places whither thou goest.

far more provoking to God, and ruinous to men, than is generally supposed. They, who worship images, saints, and angels, and present oblations to the queen of heaven, should recollect the consequences of similar practices of God's ancient people, previous to the Babylonish captivity. And they, who neglect the person and mediation of the Son of God, should consider the punishment inflicted on the Jews for rejecting and crucifying him; under which they still continue a curse and a reproach among the nations; because they have not been humbled to this day, nor have feared the Lord to obey his command of honouring the Son, "even as they should honour the Father that sent "him."

V. 15—30.

If men remember the wickedness of former ages only to imitate it, they may expect even severer punishment than that which ancient rebels suffered: for neither rank nor sex will protect the workers of iniquity. Such as neglect to use their authority to restrain their own households from wickedness, will be punished as accomplices in their crimes: yet their connivance will not excuse those, who were thus emboldened to commit impiety and vice. Men ought not to expect, that God will grant even their lawful desires, when they refuse obedience to his commands: and carnal projects which are contrary to his word, must end in wretched disappointment, however politic and plausible they may appear. The tendency of human depravity is from bad to worse, and sinners left to themselves grow continually more bold and insolent in their impiety. Reproofs exasperate those, whom they do not convince and humble. Multitudes show by their actions, that they will not hearken to the word of God; but will follow the devices and desires of their own evil hearts; and some dare to avow their purposes, and to "say to the Almighty, Depart from us, we desire not the "knowledge of thy ways!" When sinners are thus hardened and blinded by Satan, they are seldom at a loss for arguments and excuses for their conduct: and whilst the long-suffering of God towards sinners, and his judgments upon hypocrites, can supply them with reasons for the most abominable wickedness, they can never be without some apology. But such perverse inferences from providential dispensations are as absurd as unscriptural: and they who know the truth and will of God, can easily prove, that all our miseries spring from sin; all our comforts and hopes from God's mercy; and that all our well-grounded persuasions of an interest in that mercy are connected with repentance and the obedience of faith. Indeed, ingenious infidels and ungodly men may perplex the plainest subjects. And they have been so numerous in all ages and places hitherto, and have possessed so much of the wealth, power, and wisdom of the world, that they have been able plausibly to plead antiquity, authority, and general consent, in support of their pernicious doctrines and vile abominations. Thus men encourage themselves and each other, to speak and act in direct defiance of the revealed will of God; to accomplish their iniquitous purposes; to vindicate what they have done: and to bear down the servants and worshippers of the Lord. But when we have borne testimony against them, and shown the folly, wickedness, and fatal consequences of their conduct, we must leave the matter to him. He will assuredly plead his own cause, and the event will show, whether the Scripture-threatenings, or their flimsy conjectures, will stand their ground. Nay, the punishment of those who have countenanced, encouraged, and abetted their rebellion and impiety, will be a sign unto them, that the Lord's word will stand against them for evil.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLV. V. 3. Baruch seems to have been a young man, when employed to read the roll in the temple; and though he was well disposed to the service of God, he had not sufficiently counted the cost. He had been grieved, to write and read of the many and great calamities, which were coming on his people: but when he was persecuted for it by Jehoiakim, he complained that the Lord added grief to his sorrow; and he was ready to faint with excess of disquietude and terror, from which he could find no rest.

V. 4, 5. This message, though inserted subsequent to the narrative of the destruction of Jerusalem, was sent to Baruch long before, at the time when his mind was greatly discomposed. Being a man of learning and ingenuity, it seems he had formed expectations of obtaining preferment, and was "seeking great things for himself." He had perhaps hoped, that the predicted judgments would not happen in his time; and that by prudence and activity he should obtain the favour of his superiors. For this the Lord rebuked him. 'Dost thou aspire to honour and 'dignity, in a time of common calamity?' (Lowth.) God was about to break down the city and temple; to pluck up the people from the land in which he had planted them; and to make dreadful destruction upon the Jews and neighbouring nations: and was this a time for one of his servants to seek great things for himself? This was, (as one expresses it,) 'like painting his own cabin whilst the ship 'was sinking.' He was therefore commanded to give up such carnal pursuits: and he was assured, that the Lord would protect him from violence; so that neither Jehoiakim, nor the Chaldeans, nor the Jews, should put him to death; but that he should be wonderfully preserved in all places, till his time should come to die, according to the ordinary course of nature. (Note, xxi. 9.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The eyes of the Lord are always upon us; he notices the troubles of the most inconsiderable of his servants; and he will reprove or encourage them as he sees needful. We are all averse to the cross; but young converts and inexperienced ministers are most apt to be cast down by danger and opposition. Our dejections are generally greater than there is cause for; they always arise from weakness of faith and want of submission to the will of God; and they commonly have in them a great mixture of attachment to external things. We are apt to indulge a hope of being considerable in one way or other, and to flatter ourselves with the prospect of reputation or affluence; we are pleased with our own dreams, and put out of temper by being awakened out of them. But the Lord knows the real cause of our despondency better than we do; and we should beg of him to examine our hearts, and to enable us to repress and mortify every ambitious, covetous, or carnal desire. In such a world of sin and sorrow as this is at all times; (and not only in seasons of public calamity;) where death is continually ravaging, and will speedily cut us off; and which the Lord will soon break down and destroy, with all them whose treasures and hearts are in it; we should not seek more than food convenient for us. And, however our lives may be preserved, or exposed, or whithersoever we may be driven, our chief diligence should be employed in obtaining an assurance, that "when this earthly house of our tabernacle shall be dis-"solved, we shall have a building of God, an house not "made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

NOTES.

CHAP. XLVI. V. 1. This verse is 'the title of 'this and the five following chapters; and refers to the 'general denunciation of God's judgments upon the coun-'tries round about Judea, contained in the twenty-fifth 'chapter.' (Lowth.) These nations had either helped forward the calamities of the Jews, or had rejoiced at them. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2. After Pharaoh-necho had slain Josiah in battle, and had gained great advantages in the countries bordering on the Euphrates, as he returned home, he entered Jerusalem, carried Jehoahaz captive into Egypt, and left Jehoiakim upon the throne of Judah. Some time after he raised a very great army, and marched into the same regions, to extend his conquests. But previously this prophecy had been delivered, in which his entire defeat by Nebuchadnezzar was predicted; (Notes, 2 Kings, xxiii. 29, 30. xxiv. 6.) This took place about the same time that Jehoiakim, the vassal or ally of Pharaoh, was carried captive to Babylon; who, making submissions to Nebuchadnezzar, was restored to his kingdom.

V. 3, 4. This is a poetical and ironical call to the Egyptians to muster their forces, and implies that all their courage and efforts would be in vain. (5, 6.)

V. 6. The original is future, and may more properly be rendered, "The swift shall not flee away; neither shall "the mighty man escape, &c." For it is a clear prediction of what would certainly take place; and not an expression of what the prophet wished or prayed for.

V. 7, 8. 'He derideth the boastings of the Egyptians, 9 Come up, ye horses; and [q] rage, ye chariots; and let the mighty men come forth; the * Ethiopians and the Lybians, that handle the shield; and [r] the Lydians, that handle and bend the bow.

10 For this is [s] the day of the Lord GOD of hosts, a day of vengeance, that he may avenge him of his adversaries: [t] and the sword shall devour, and it shall be satiate, and made drunk with their blood: for the Lord GOD of hosts hath a sacrifice in the north country by the river Euphrates.

11 Go up into [u] Gilead, and take balm, [x] O virgin, the daughter of Egypt: [y] in vain shalt thou use many medicines; for † thou shalt not be cured.

12 The nations have [z] heard of thy shame, and [a] thy cry hath filled the land: for the mighty man hath [b] stumbled against the mighty, and they are fallen both together.

B. C. 587.

13 ¶ The word that the LORD spake to Jeremiah the prophet, how [c] Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon should come, and smite the land of Egypt.

14 Declare ye in Egypt, and publish in [d] Migdol, and publish in Noph, and in Tahpanhes: say ye, [e] Stand fast, and prepare thee, for [f] the sword shall devour round about thee.

15 Why are [g] thy valiant men swept away? they stood not, because the LORD did drive them.

16 He ‡ made many to fall, yea, [h] one fell upon another; and [i] they said, Arise, and let us go again to our own people, and to the land of our nativity, from the oppressing sword.

17 They did cry there, [k] Pharaoh king of Egypt is but a noise; he hath passed the time appointed.

18 As I live, [l] saith the King, whose name is The LORD of hosts, Surely as [m] Tabor is among the mountains, and as [n] Carmel by the sea, so shall he come.

'who thought by their riches and power to have overcome 'all the world; alluding to the river Nilus, which at cer-'tain times overfloweth the country of Egypt.' Chaldea and Babylon seem especially meant, which Pharaoh-necho vainly expected to subjugate.

V. 9. 'These names in Hebrew are Cush, and Phul, 'and Lud,' (Marg. Ref.) who were the Egyptians' allies, '(Ez. xxx. 5.) which makes it probable that they are all 'Africans: Cush, though it often signifies Arabia, yet 'sometimes denotes Ethiopia. Phul is here rendered Ly-'bia: but Phul and Lubim are spoken of as distinct peo-'ple, (Nah. iii. 9.) Phul may probably signify Maurita-'nia, and Lud, or Ludim, the people of Meroe. These 'were famous for the use of the bow," (Is. lxvi. 19.) (Lowth.)

V. 10. Pharaoh expected a day of victory and triumph: but the Lord intended a day of vengeance on him and on his army, and to make them a sacrifice to his offended justice, especially for their sin, in oppressing or deceiving Israel. 'The day of the LORD often signifies the day of 'his vengeance: from thence it comes to signify the day 'of judgment, in the New Testament, of which all other 'days of vengeance are earnests and forerunners.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11. (Note, viii. 22.) 'He showeth, that no salve 'or medicine can prevail, where God giveth the wound.'

V. 12. The disgrace of being vanquished is commonly as much dreaded by mighty and haughty monarchs and nations, as the actual loss or suffering. The pride of Pharaoh and the Egyptians would, however, soon be, in this respect, most deeply mortified. This prophecy seems to have been fulfilled very soon after it was published. (Note, 2.)

V. 13. This verse introduces a prediction of a more complete conquest of Egypt, which took place about eighteen years after the destruction of Jerusalem. Probably it was delivered by Jeremiah, after he went down into Egypt. (Notes, xliii. 8—13. xliv. 29, 30. Ez. xxix. —xxxii.)

V. 14. Stand, &c. That is, 'Prepare to act upon 'the defensive, for Egypt will soon be invaded.'

V. 15. The Hebrew word, rendered valiant, is some-'times spoken of God, (Gen. xlix. 24;) sometimes it is 'a title given to angels; (Ps. lxxviii. 25;) and here, the 'Septuagint understand it of Apis, the idol of Egypt.' (Lowth.) It does not, however, appear, that the original can at all bear the interpretation put on it by the Septuagint: for, besides rendering a plural noun by the singular Apis, they add, "thy elect calf could not abide." It is not improbable, that both the translation and the interpolation were intended as an attack on the Egyptian idolatry; an injudicious and criminal, even if a well intended, measure; which has too often been imitated by those, who, to serve a good cause, are not very scrupulous about the means which they employ.

V. 16, 17. The allies of Egypt, finding themselves unable to maintain the conflict, and perceiving that Pharaoh, though he had boasted great things, was not punctual to his engagements in coming to their assistance, resolved to escape for their lives, and return home, if they were able.

V. 18. 'Mount Tabor is not more surely fixed among 'the rest of the mountains, nor Carmel more immoveably 'seated upon the sea-coast, than this word of mine is 'firmly fixed in heaven, and shall undoubtedly be per-'formed. The king of Babylon shall come against Egypt.' (Bp. Hall.)

19 O thou daughter dwelling in Egypt, * furnish thyself to [p] go into captivity: for [q] Noph shall be [r] waste and desolate without an inhabitant.

20 Egypt is like [s] a very fair heifer, but destruction cometh; [t] it cometh out of the north.

21 Also [u] her hired men are in the midst of her [x] like † fatted bullocks: for they also are turned back, and are fled away together: [y] they did not stand, because [z] the day of their calamity was come upon them, and the time of their visitation.

22 The [a] voice thereof shall go like a serpent; for they shall march with an army, [b] and come against her with axes, as hewers of wood.

23 They shall cut down [c] her forest, saith the LORD, though it cannot be searched; [d] because they are more than the grasshoppers, and are innumerable.

24 The [e] daughter of Egypt shall be confounded; [f] she shall be delivered into the hand of the people of the north.

25 The LORD of hosts, the God of Israel, saith; Behold, I will punish ‡ the multitude of [g] No, and Pharaoh, and Egypt, [h] with their gods, [i] and their kings; even Pharaoh, [k] and all them that trust in him.

26 And [l] I will deliver them into the hand of those that seek their lives, and into the hand of Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon, and into the hand of his servants: [m] and afterward it shall be inhabited, as in the days of old, saith the LORD.

27 ¶ But [n] fear not thou, O my servant Jacob, and be not dismayed, O Israel: for, behold, [o] I will save thee from afar off, and thy seed from the land of their captivity; and Jacob shall return, [p] and be in rest, and at ease, and none shall make him afraid.

28 Fear thou not, O Jacob my servant, saith the LORD; [q] for I am with thee; for I will [r] make a full end of all the nations whither I have driven thee: [s] but I will not make a full end of thee, but [t] correct thee in measure; yet will I § not leave thee wholly unpunished.

V. 19. Furnish, &c. 'The expression is ironical, 'implying, that instead of the rich and goodly furniture, 'wherein she did pride herself, she should be carried 'away captive, naked and bare, and wanting all manner 'of conveniences.' (Lowth.)

V. 20. 'In the foregoing verse, the prophet compared Egypt to a delicate young woman. Here he resembles 'her to a fat and well favoured heifer. Grotius, not im- 'probably, conjectures, that there is an allusion to their 'god Apis, who was a bull remarkable for his beauty.' (Lowth.) The last clause is very emphatical. "Destruc- "tion from the north, it cometh, it cometh."

V. 21. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 22 The Egyptians would no longer utter boasting words; but in a more abject and timid manner give vent to their terror and resentment, like a serpent hissing out of its hole, or when it is pursued.

V. 23. The cities of Egypt were very many, and the inhabitants both numerous and wealthy; but this would only render them a richer booty to the conqueror, as the hewer of wood prefers those forests where the trees are many and of large growth. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 25. Multitude of No. 'The Hebrew reads Am- 'mon Minno, which may be literally rendered Ammon of 'No. The same place is expressed by Ezekiel by Hamon 'No, (Ez. xxx. 15.) And in Nahum it is called No Am- 'mon, (Nah. iii. 8.) The name is generally thought to 'be derived from Jupiter Ammon, whose temple was 'there. It is rendered Diospolis by the Septuagint, which 'is the Greek name for Thebes, famous in Homer's time 'for its hundred gates.' (Lowth.)

V. 26. (Note, xliv. 29, 30.) It is supposed that Pharaoh-hophra was slain by Amasis; but Amasis was at that time the deputy of Nebuchadnezzar, who was principally employed in executing the vengeance of God on the Egyptians.

Afterward, &c. Nebuchadnezzar's conquest of Egypt was preceded, attended, and followed, by violent internal convulsions and revolutions: and Egypt did not recover from these calamities till about forty years afterwards. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 27, 28. (Note, xxx. 10, 11.) The Jews, who had taken shelter in Egypt, were, with very few exceptions, devoted to destruction; but this repetition of the Lord's former assurances to the nation of Israel, was intended to encourage the hopes of those in other places, who regarded his word, with the prospect of better times and returning tranquillity.

The repetition, also, of so remarkable a promise, shows that it was considered as of very great importance, and should remind us of its remarkable accomplishment even to this day. The words, "Fear not thou, O Jacob, &c." are repeated in the concluding verse, which gives the promise additional energy, and renders the passage peculiarly poetical.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Every part of Scripture speaks terror to the impenitent and unbelieving, and comfort to those who obey the Gospel.—The vast preparations, which in all ages have been made for the destruction of the human species, (as if men did not die fast enough in the ordinary course of nature,) show

2 Thus saith the LORD; Behold, [b] waters rise up [c] out of the north, and shall be an overflowing flood, and shall overflow the land, and † all that is therein, the city, and them that dwell therein: [d] then the men shall cry, and all the inhabitants of the land shall howl.

the power of Satan, the great murderer from the beginning, over our fallen race, by means of the pride, ambition, avarice, and revenge of the human heart: and likewise that God considers men as condemned criminals, whom he employs as executioners of each other, as he sees good.—Neither valour, strength, speed, nor numbers, can avail those whom the righteous God determines to make sacrifices to his justice; but they must be dismayed, flee away, and not escape; and all their vain-glorious boasts and sanguine expectations must end in disappointment and confusion. They that plot mischief against others, generally fall into it themselves: and the wounds that God inflicts on his enemies can be healed by no medicines.—How do power and prosperity pass from one to another in this changing world! Those nations that were the terror of the mighty, and seemed ready to cover the earth, are speedily so weakened, that they cannot defend themselves! But nothing so exposes kingdoms to hostile invaders as intestine discords; whilst mighty men thus stumble one against another, they all fall together, and the state becomes incapable of defending itself against the devouring sword of its enemies. When such events take place, when allies prove treacherous, and renowned princes and captains but a noise; when valiant men are swept away or put to flight, the hand of the Lord should be acknowledged. For how can they stand, whom he driveth away? or be courageous, whom he surrounds with terrors! When his day of visitation cometh, the magnificence, luxury, and affluence of mighty nations vanish as a dream: and those who were sensual, and strong as fatted bullocks, fall an easy prey to every invader, and can no more resist them, than the forest can the axe of him that felleth it. So that they who trust in themselves, or in an arm of flesh, must be confounded and punished. But there is an appointed period to all earthly calamities: and therefore our grand concern is, to flee from the wrath to come. Instead of making provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof, we should be daily preparing for death and judgment. Having sought reconciliation to our offended God through Jesus Christ, we should stand fast in the faith, and seek to be furnished with patience and hope against every event; for we know not what captivity, poverty, or tribulation, may await us: and therefore habitual self-denial and mortification to the world are our wisdom, as well as our duty. But nothing should dismay the servants of the Lord: he will save them from every place, where they have been scattered, and bring them to enjoy his rest and peace: he will be with them, and only correct them in measure; and will not punish any of them with that everlasting destruction from his presence, which awaits all impenitent transgressors.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLVII. V. 1. 'Jeremiah had foretold that 'the Philistines should be conquered by Nebuchadnezzar, '(xxv. 20.) This probably came to pass during the time 'of the siege of Tyre, which lasted thirteen years, as 'Josephus shows out of Philostratus, and the Phœnician 'annals.' (4.) (Lowth.) The Philistines had repeatedly been subjected by the kings of Judah; but they had again recovered strength. The prophecy was delivered before Pharaoh took Gaza. 'This might probably happen after 'Pharaoh's victories at Megiddo and Carchemish, when 'Judea became tributary to him.' (Lowth.) The Philistines seem to have been at that time in prosperity, and at peace with the Chaldeans. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. (Note, viii. 16. Marg. Ref.) The terrifying circumstances of this invasion would so dismay the Philistines, that they would not dare to look back, even to see what became of their own children.

V. 4. Every helper, &c. The destruction of the Philistines would tend to weaken the power of their confederates, the Tyrians and Zidonians; and to prepare the way for their subjection by Nebuchadnezzar. But some understand the words to signify, that the ruin of Tyre and Zidon, the helpers of the Philistines, would leave them without resource in their abject condition.

V. 5. This represents the total desolation of Gaza, which, with those of Ashkelon, would cause inconsolable grief to the inhabitants: this they would express, by tearing or shaving off their hair, and cutting their flesh. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6. Some understand this verse as the words of the Philistines, but it is not likely that they should consider the Chaldeans as "the sword of JEHOVAH." It is rather a most animated and pathetic lamentation of the prophet over the miseries, which the just vengeance of God was inflicting on the nations for their sins. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7. 'The prophet here returns an answer to the 'foregoing verse, importing that the havoc made by the 'sword among the Philistines was the effect of God's 'irreversible purpose and decree.' (Lowth.) The original continues the animated apostrophe of the question, "How "canst thou be quiet? &c." "The sea-shore," (included in this commission,) would take in Tyre and Zidon, which generally shared its fortunes: and this confirms the opinion, that the prophecy was fulfilled during the siege of Tyre by Nebuchadnezzar.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Men often apprehend no danger from that quarter, whence evil is appointed against them. The height of ungodly prosperity is the fore-runner of destruction; and sinful pleasures terminate in out-cries and howlings of misery. We should commit our children to the Lord's keeping; for we know not how soon we may be deprived of power or heart to take any care of them ourselves.—When he intends to destroy the wicked, he will cut off every helper; and where he spoils, he will remove all consolation. The miseries occasioned by war should be regretted by us; and we should desire, that this sword of the Lord might be put into the scabbard and be still: yet we should be ready to acquiesce in his appointments, who, in perfect wisdom and justice, gives it commission, and will cause it to effect his appointments, notwithstanding all the power of those who attempt to stop its progress.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLVIII. V. 1. 'The following prophecies 'against Moab, Ammon, Edom, and the neighbouring coun-'tries, seem to have been fulfilled, during the siege of 'Tyre, (Ez. xxv. 8, &c.) Josephus places these events five 'years after the destruction of Jerusalem. Jeremiah, in 'his prophecy, borrows several expressions from Isaiah's 'prophecy against the same people; though that was pro-'bably fulfilled several years before.' (Lowth.) The predictions of Isaiah, it is probable, were fulfilled by Shalmaneser, but those of Jeremiah by Nebuchadnezzar. (Notes, Is. xv. xvi.)

V. 2. Moab should be no more praised as an honourable kingdom: for the invaders, having possessed themselves of Heshbon, would determine on the utter ruin of the nation. Or the passage may mean, that there should be no more glorying in Moab, concerning Heshbon, as a strong fortress or a flourishing city; for their enemies had devised their complete destruction. (Old. Trans.) A confederacy of the Moabites and the neighbouring nations is represented, by the Psalmist, as using the same language concerning Israel, which the Chaldeans are here introduced as employing concerning Moab. (Ps. lxxxiii. 4—12.)

V. 5. The lamentations of the Moabites would be so loud and grievous, as to be heard even by their enemies, at a distance; and thus they would direct them in their pursuit of the fugitives.

V. 6. 'Escape for your lives, and be content to be left poor and desolate, (Note, xvii. 5, 6;) and hide yourselves in barren places, whither the enemy will not pursue you.'

V. 7. The Moabites had confided in their fortifications or methods of defence, and in the riches laid up in their treasuries; or in their superstitious observances, and the treasures dedicated to their idol Chemosh. (Marg. Ref.)—

8 And [o] the spoiler shall come upon every city, [p] and no city shall escape: the valley also shall perish, and the plain shall be destroyed, as the LORD hath spoken.

9 Give [q] wings unto Moab, that it may flee and get away: for [r] the cities thereof shall be desolate, without any to dwell therein.

10 [s] Cursed be he that doeth the work of the LORD * deceitfully, and cursed be he that keepeth back his sword from blood.

11 ¶ Moab [t] hath been at ease from his youth, and [u] he hath settled on his lees, and hath not been emptied from vessel to vessel, neither hath he gone into captivity: [x] therefore his taste † remaineth in him, and his scent is not changed.

12 Therefore, behold, the days come, saith the LORD, that I will send unto him [y] wanderers that shall cause him to wander, and shall [z] empty his vessels, and break their bottles.

13 And Moab shall be [a] ashamed of Chemosh, [b] as the house of Israel was ashamed of Bethel their confidence.

14 [c] How say ye, [d] We are mighty and strong men for the war?

15 Moab is [e] spoiled, and gone up out of her cities, and ‡ his chosen young men are [f] gone down to the slaughter, [g] saith the King, whose name is The LORD of hosts.

16 The calamity of Moab is [h] near to come, and his affliction hasteth fast.

17 All ye that are about him, [i] bemoan him; and all ye that know his name, say, [k] How is the strong staff broken, and the beautiful rod!

18 Thou [l] daughter that dost inhabit [m] Dibon, come down from thy glory, [n] and sit in thirst; for the spoiler of Moab shall come upon thee, and he shall destroy thy strong holds.

19 O ◊ inhabitant of [o] Aroer, stand by the way, and espy; [p] ask him that fleeth, and her that escapeth, and say, What is done?

20 Moab is [q] confounded; for it is broken down: howl and cry; tell ye it in [r] Arnon, that Moab is spoiled,

21 And judgment is come upon [s] the plain country; upon Holon, and upon [t] Jahazah, and upon Mephaath,

22 And upon [u] Dibon, and upon Nebo, and upon Beth-diblathaim,

23 And upon [x] Kiriathaim, and upon Beth-gamul, and upon [y] Beth-meon, 24 And upon [z] Kerioth, and upon [a] Bozrah, and upon all the cities of the land of Moab, far or near.

25 The [b] horn of Moab is cut off, [c] and his arm is broken, saith the LORD.

V. 9. 'No common speed can deliver Moab from that 'imminent danger that threatens him.' (Lowth.)

V. 10. The Chaldeans were commissioned to execute vengeance on Moab; and they would expose themselves to vengeance if they did it partially. This emphatically denoted, that God would effectually take care for the performance of his word; and would find instruments who would not keep back their swords from blood. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11. The nation of Moab, though small, was very ancient, and had for many ages continued independent and prosperous. It had experienced few of those violent convulsions and revolutions with which the surrounding nations had been harassed: and though the Moabites seem to have suffered grievous calamities some years before; yet they had not been carried out of their land by repeated captivities, as Israel and Judah had been; and they had recovered their strength and prosperity before this time. They were therefore like wine left long to refine and feed on the lees; which becomes much stronger than when frequently emptied from vessel to vessel. Having met with little disturbance, they were become proud, presumptuous, secure, and sensual; indulging in wickedness habitually, and from age to age, without any degree of reformation.

V. 12. The Chaldeans would march far from home under the secret direction of God to conquer the Moabites, and to carry them away captive into a distant country; desolating their cities, wasting their country, and destroying all that they had gloried in.

V. 13. 'As the calf of Bethel was not able to deliver 'the Israelites, no more shall Chemosh deliver the Moab-'ites.'

27 For was not [h] Israel a derision unto thee? [i] was he found among thieves? for since thou spakest of him, thou * skippedst for joy.

28 O ye that dwell in Moab, [k] leave the cities, and dwell in the rock, and be [l] like the dove that maketh her nest in the sides of the hole's mouth.

29 ¶ We have [m] heard the pride of Moab, (he is exceeding proud,) [n] his loftiness, and his arrogancy, and his pride, and the haughtiness of his heart.

35 Moreover I will cause to cease in Moab, saith the LORD, [e] him that offereth in the high places, and him that burneth incense to his gods.

36 Therefore [f] mine heart shall sound for Moab like pipes, and mine heart shall sound like pipes for the men of [g] Kirheres; because [h] the riches that he hath gotten are perished.

37 For [i] every head shall be bald, and every beard ‖ clipped: upon all the hands shall be [k] cuttings, and [l] upon the loins sackcloth.

39 They shall howl, saying, [o] How is it broken down! how hath Moab turned the ‖ back with shame! so shall Moab be [p] a derision and a dismaying to all them about him.

40 For thus saith the LORD, Behold; [q] he shall fly as an eagle, and shall [r] spread his wings over Moab.

41 * Kerioth is taken, and the strong holds are surprised, and the mighty men's hearts in Moab at that day shall be [s] as the heart of a woman in her pangs.

V. 27. The Moabites exceedingly rejoiced at the calamities of Israel, and insulted over the sufferers; as thieves are sometimes derided when apprehended in the fact: but the sufferers had not injured them, and their joy arose from malice, envy, and enmity against the God of Israel.

V. 29, 30. Isaiah brought this same charge against Moab, but their pride grew more intolerable than ever. The several expressions here employed denote the various ways, in which the Moabites showed their insolence and arrogance; especially it appeared in their haughty indignation against Israel, and their slanders and ostentatious boastings of what they would do against them: but the Lord knew all their purposes and dissimulation, and would take care that they should not succeed. 'The word rendered 'lies, sometimes means those who pretend to the arts of 'divination. If we take the words in this sense, the 'meaning is, that although the soothsayers and magi- 'cians, upon whose skill Moab relies, promise him good 'success, and thereby increase his pride and arrogance; 'yet in the event it will appear that there was nothing of 'truth in what they said.' these severe judgments on Moab, a heathen nation, is this, that "he had magnified himself against JEHOVAH." (Marg. Ref.)

V. 43, 44. (Note, Isaiah, xxiv. 17, 18.)

V. 45, 46. Heshbon, a strong fenced city, would by no means prove a refuge to those who took shelter there: for falling into the hands of the conquerors, a fire would, as it were, issue from it, to destroy the rest of the country. The prophet on this occasion adopts the language in which the Amorites, many ages before, had triumphantly exulted over Moab. (Note, Num. xxi. 26. 30.)

V. 47. 'The Moabites were afterwards restored to 'their country, as appears from Josephus: but these and 'such like promises of mercy, after judgment, are chiefly 'to be understood of the conversion of the Gentiles to 'Christ, under the Gospel, called the latter days by the 'prophets.' (Lowth.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—25.

Wo be to all those against whom the Lord of Hosts hath spoken! they can expect nothing but terror and confusion; all their praise and honour must expire in infamy; they who devise evil against them will succeed according to their wishes; the sword of justice will pursue them; weeping and bitter wailing will attend their great destruction; and generally their children are involved in calamities on their account. There is indeed a Refuge provided for sinners: and the exhortation should be very pressing "to "flee from the wrath to come," to seek the salvation of their souls, and to forsake all for Christ and the Gospel; as men in perilous circumstances part with all their substance to save their lives. But the case of obstinate unbelievers is very dreadful; for how shall they escape, who neglect "so great salvation?" They who trust in their own works, treasures, or superstitions, will soon be overtaken by the vengeance of God, and will go into destruction, along with their idols and deceivers, and will for ever be made ashamed of their confidences. No guilty city, village, or individual, shall be able to escape the ruin that the Lord hath spoken against them: and if any could give wings to sinners, they could not fly out of the reach of divine indignation. Whatever the Lord enjoins us must be done heartily, and according to his word, if we would escape his curse. We should indeed be thankful, that we are required to seek the preservation of men's lives, and the salvation of their souls, and not to shed their blood; but we shall be the more inexcusable, if we do this work deceitfully, preferring our own interest, credit, inclination, or indulgence, to the glory and will of God: and it is great insolence, for man to pretend to be more merciful than his Creator. When men continue long in peace, wealth, and prosperity, and escape the calamities which others experience, they are apt to grow insensible and secure; to contract habits of pride, impiety, iniquity, and self-indulgence; to cleave without remorse to evil practices, and to proceed from bad to worse: so that great prosperity is peculiarly dangerous to us fallen creatures. But when the Lord's time comes, he will send upon sinners, who are thus settled on their lees, such judgments as will dash their comforts and hopes in pieces. In vain do men say, that they are mighty and strong for the battle: when the King, the Lord of hosts, hath a controversy with a people, their young men go down to the slaughter, rather than to battle; and all the beauty and strength of nations only tend to increase the astonishment of those who bemoan their ruin, and exclaim, "How is the strong staff "broken, and the beautiful rod!" Every circumstance, that tended to increase their glory, now enhances their misery; and every inquiry about what is done makes known their terror and distress. But "the Lord is right-"eous in all his ways, and holy in all his works:" He does not cut off the horn and break the arm of any, except such as have magnified themselves against him.

V. 26—47.

When sinners grow intoxicated with pride and ungodly lusts, the Lord will make them drunken with his judgments, and expose them to shame and derision. He abhors those who rejoice in the calamities of their neighbours, and insult over the miserable, and especially over his inoffensive worshippers. Yet this is a general effect of the envy, malice, selfishness, and impiety, of the human heart. But pride, in its multiplied exercises, is the fruitful root of unnumbered crimes, and when this diabolical vice grows stronger continually, disgrace and ruin are at hand; for "a haughty spirit goes before a fall:" and the Lord knows the malice, deceit, and lies, of his enemies, and will disappoint them. It becomes us to compassionate the sufferings even of our enemies, when joy and gladness are taken away from the plentiful field; when penury and famine succeed luxury and abundance, and the riches of those who once lived in splendour are perished; we should sympathize in their sorrows, and be ready to afford them such relief as we are able. But we should also take warning to avoid their transgressions; and, amidst the changes and calamities that surround us, we should learn to "set our "affections on things above, and not on things on the "earth." If our sins be pardoned, and our hearts renewed, the Lord will preserve us from every fear, pit, and snare, into which others fall; and whilst the vessels of wrath, in which he had no pleasure, and which are fitted for destruction, shall perish for ever, he will effectually take care of those vessels of mercy, whom he hath afore prepared for his glory.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLIX. V. 1. The old translation more exactly renders the first clause, "Unto the children of "Ammon, thus saith the LORD." The same may be noted concerning the other nations mentioned in this chapter. The king of Ammon had sent Ishmael to murder Gedaliah, and probably Nebuchadnezzar intended to revenge that injury, when he made war against the Ammonites: but the Lord had a controversy with them, on account of their injustice to his people Israel. Being situated on the north-east border of the land, the Ammonites seized every opportunity of getting possession of their cities and lands, as if the Israelites had no heirs; and thus the subjects of the king of Ammon, or the worshippers of Melcom the idol of Ammon, (so it may be understood,) dwelt in the lot of Gad, and in the cities which God had given to his people, and which had not belonged to their ancestors. It seems that their rapacity was attended with the most shocking barbarity. (Note, Amos i. 13—15.) Even before the Syrians and Assyrians had dispossessed the Israelites, several cities, originally given to Gad or Reuben, were possessed by the Ammonites. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2. Daughters. 'The lesser cities, which are reck-'oned as so many daughters to the mother-city.' 'The 'Jews made themselves masters of the Ammonites and the 'neighbouring countries under the Maccabees,' (1 Mac. v. 6, 7.) 'The words heir and inheritance, in the Hebrew, 'signify any real and lasting possession.' (Lowth.)

V. 3. When Ai, a city of the Ammonites, is des-'troyed,—it is time for Heshbon, the chief city of Moab, 'to lament her danger; for her turn comes next.' (xlviii. 2.) (Lowth.) 'Howl, O Heshbon, the chief city of the 'Gadites, (usurped by Ammon;) for Ai, the neighbouring 'city, is spoiled.' (Bp. Hall.) Heshbon, the capital of Sihon's kingdom, had originally been taken from Moab. (Num. xxi. 26—30:) and it is generally supposed that Heshbon of Moab, (xlviii. 2.) is the same city, the Moabites having again got possession of it. But it is not certain that another city, called after the name of that which the Amorites took from Moab, might not be intended. The kingdom of Sihon was divided between Reuben and Gad: Heshbon was at first allotted to Reuben; but it is afterwards mentioned as a city of Gad. (Num. xxxii. 34—38. Josh. xiii. 15—18. xxi. 39.) So that either Moab, or Ammon, had taken it from Reuben or Gad. Heshbon is mentioned by Isaiah as a city of Moab; as are several others, which had been given to Reuben and Gad. (Compare Num. xxxii. 34—38, and Josh. xiii. 15—28, with Is. xv. xvi:) but Heshbon, as a city of Ammon, is not elsewhere mentioned.

Run to, &c. 'Try to hide yourselves in the thickets, 'and remove from one place to another for fear of being 'discovered.' (Lowth.)

—Their king, &c. Or Melcom. (Marg. Reading. xlviii. 7.)

V. 4. The Ammonites gloried, either in the security of their valleys, as surrounded on every side with mountains, so that no army could penetrate into their country; or in the fruitfulness of them: one in particular was called "the flowing valley," as resembling Canaan, that flowed with milk and honey. Ammon is called a backsliding daughter, either as having apostatized from the religion of Lot, the ancestor of the nation, or as refractory and rebellious, which the word may signify.

the captivity of the children of Ammon, saith the LORD.

7 ¶ Concerning [t] Edom, thus saith the LORD of hosts, [u] Is wisdom no more in Teman? [x] is counsel perished from the prudent? is their wisdom vanished?

8 [y] Flee ye, *turn back, [z] dwell deep, O inhabitants of [a] Dedan: [b] for I will bring the calamity of Esau upon him, the time that I will visit him.

9 If [c] grape-gatherers come to thee, would they not leave some gleaning grapes? if thieves by night, they will destroy † till they have enough.

10 But [d] I have made Esau bare, I have uncovered [e] his secret places, and he shall not be able to hide himself: [f] his seed is spoiled, and his brethren, and his neighbours, and [g] he is not.

11 [h] Leave thy fatherless children, I will preserve them alive; and [i] let thy widows trust in me.

12 For thus saith the LORD, Behold, [k] they whose judgment was not to drink of the cup, have assuredly drunken: and art thou he that shall altogether go unpunished? thou shalt not go unpunished, but thou shalt surely drink of it.

13 For [l] I have sworn by myself, saith the LORD, that [m] Bozrah shall become [n] a desolation, a reproach, a waste, and a curse; and all the cities thereof shall be perpetual wastes.

14 I have [o] heard a rumour from the LORD, and [p] an ambassador is sent unto the heathen, saying, [q] Gather ye together and come against her, and rise up to the battle.

15 For, lo, [r] I will make thee small among the heathen, and despised among men.

16 Thy [s] terribleness hath deceived thee, and the pride of thine heart, O thou that dwellest in the clefts of the rock, that holdest the height of the hill: [t] though thou shouldest make thy nest as high as the eagle, I will bring thee down from thence, saith the LORD.

V. 6. (Note, xlviii. 47.) It is observable, that the Septuagint leave out these intimations of mercy in reserve for the descendants of Moab and Ammon; though that concerning Elam is not omitted. (39.)—'The conversion 'of idolaters is expressed by returning from their captivi-'ty.' (Ez. xvi. 53.) (Lowth.)

V. 7. (Marg. Ref.)—Eliphaz, the friend of Job, was a Temanite; and it is probable, that the descendants of Esau were among those children of the east, who in Solomon's days were famed for wisdom, (1 Kings, iv. 30:) but, 'when God designs a people for destruction, he 'deprives them of that common prudence and foresight, 'which is requisite for the management of their affairs; 'and takes from them their usual courage, so that "a thou-"sand flee at the rebuke of one." (Obad. 8, 9.) (Lowth.)

V. 8. Ezekiel mentions Dedan twice, in his account of those who traded with Tyre: in one place he speaks of the Dedanites, the descendants of Dedan, the son of Abraham by Keturah; in the other, as it is probable, of those who inhabited Dedan, a city in Idumæa. (Gen. xxv. 3. Ez. xxvii. 15. 20.)

Dwell, &c. That is, 'Retire into your caverns and 'fastnesses, to secure yourselves, for there will be no se-'curity in the open country, or even in the cities.'

V. 9—11. (Ob. 5, 6.) Grape-gatherers generally leave some gleanings; and nocturnal depredators take what they can, yet do not destroy every thing: but the Chaldeans, whom God employed to desolate Edom, would entirely spoil them; they would discover and plunder their secret treasures, and leave them no refuge to hide in; and they would so destroy their seed, and brethren, and neighbours, that there would be none left to say to those that were dying; 'Leave thy orphans and widows to my care, 'and I will provide for them.'—This seems the most natural meaning of the passage in this connexion; though the latter part of it is generally quoted as a promise to the people of God, when about to leave the world: and some suppose, that it was intended for the afflicted Israelites, to remind them of the advantages which they possessed above the Edomites. Some indeed understand it ironically, as if no orphans or widows would remain, about whom the dying Edomites need be concerned: but so entire a massacre does not often take place; and such a way of predicting so dire an event does not accord with the general manner of the holy Scriptures.

V. 12. The people of God might have expected an exemption from the calamities which overtook his enemies; yet they had been deeply involved in them: and could the Edomites hope to escape?—Not the character, but the peculiar privileges of the Israelites, were alluded to. (1 Pet. iv. 17, 18.)

V. 13. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Is. xxxiv. lxiii. 1—6.)

V. 14. 'God's stirring up men's spirits is described 'here, as if he had sent ambassadors to the Chaldeans and 'their confederates, to engage them in the war against the 'Idumæans.' (Lowth.)

V. 16. The word rendered terribleness is, by some, supposed to mean an idol worshipped by the Idumæans, from which they expected help, but which would disappoint their confidence.—'Jerom, who lived in the neigh-'bourhood, tells us, in his commentary on Obadiah, that 'Idumæa was a rocky mountainous country; and that the 'inhabitants dwelt in caves dug out of the rocks and hills.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

17 Also [u] Edom shall be a desolation: every one that goeth by it shall be astonished, and [x] shall hiss at all the plagues thereof.

18 As [y] in the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah, and the neighbour-cities thereof, saith the LORD, [z] no man shall abide there, neither shall a son of man dwell in it.

19 Behold, [a] he shall come up like a lion from [b] the swelling of Jordan against the habitation of the strong: but I will suddenly make him run away from her; and who is a chosen man, that I may appoint over her? for [c] who is like me? and who will * appoint me the time? and who is [d] that shepherd that will stand before me?

20 Therefore hear [e] the counsel of the LORD, that he hath taken against Edom; and his purposes, that he hath purposed against the inhabitants of [f] Teman: [g] Surely the least of the flock shall draw them out, surely he shall [h] make their habitations desolate with them.

21 The [i] earth is moved at the noise of their fall; at the cry, the noise thereof was heard in the † Red Sea.

22 Behold, [k] he shall come up, and fly as the eagle, and spread his wings over [l] Bozrah: and at that day shall [m] the heart of the mighty men of Edom be as the heart of a woman in her pangs.

23 ¶ Concerning [n] Damascus. [o] Hamath is confounded, and Arpad: for they have heard evil tidings: they are ‡ faint-hearted; there is [p] sorrow ϕ on the sea; it cannot be quiet.

24 Damascus is [q] waxed feeble, and turneth herself to flee, and fear hath seized on her: anguish and sorrows have taken her, as a woman in travail.

25 [r] How is the city of praise not left, the city of my joy!

26 Therefore [s] her young men shall fall in her streets, and all the men of war shall be cut off in that day, saith the LORD of hosts.

27 And [t] I will kindle a fire in the wall of Damascus, and it shall consume the palaces of [u] Ben-hadad.

28 ¶ Concerning [x] Kedar, and concerning the kingdoms [y] of Hazor, which Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon shall smite, thus saith the LORD; [z] Arise ye, go up to Kedar, and [a] spoil the men of the east.

29 Their [b] tents and their flocks shall they take away: they shall take to themselves their [c] curtains, and all their vessels, and their [d] camels; and they shall cry unto them, [e] Fear is on every side.

V. 17, 18. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 19, 20. Nebuchadnezzar was about to come up, (as a lion from the banks of Jordan, when driven from his den by the overflowing waters, he fiercely assaulted the sheep-folds;) and the Lord would cause him suddenly to run upon the land of Edom, though it was strongly fortified: or he would cause the Edomites suddenly to run out of the land, as despairing of success against so powerful an invader. For the Lord had, as it were, summoned all the valiant captains of the earth to appear before him, that he might appoint one to this service; and from them all he had chosen Nebuchadnezzar. And who, like the Lord, was able to prepare instruments to his work? Who dared to appoint him a time, either to meet him in judgment, or to face him in battle? Or what ruler of Edom would dare to withstand Him, and the weapons of his indignation? What shepherd could meet this fierce lion, to defend the sheep fold against him? Let then the Edomites hear the counsel and purpose of God against them, for he meant so to enfeeble and intimidate them, that the least of Nebuchadnezzar's soldiers would be able to draw them out of their cities, and to lead them into captivity. (l. 44, 45. Marg. Ref.)

V. 21. All the adjacent regions would hear with astonishment of Edom's ruin; and the outcries of the sufferers would be heard at the Red Sea, which lay at a considerable distance.

V. 22. (Note, xlviii. 40. Marg. Ref.)

V. 23. (Marg. Ref.) Damascus, the chief city of Syria, is put for the whole country, which it is probable Nebuchadnezzar totally subdued during the siege of Tyre.

On the, &c. Or, "as on the sea," when the ship is sinking, and the sailors have nothing but death before their eyes.

V. 25. This may be considered as the language of the king or the inhabitants of Damascus, when they found their city, which they had so much applauded and rejoiced in, involved in the common fate of other cities that had been desolated by the Chaldeans.

V. 27. Ben-hadad. A common name of the kings of Syria; (Marg. Ref.) The accomplishment of these prophecies on the surrounding nations, during the captivity of the Jews in Babylon, would greatly tend to encourage their hopes of that deliverance, which had been predicted by the same prophet: and to impress the spectators with a conviction, that the God of Israel was indeed the Lord of heaven and earth.

V. 28. Kedar and Hazor seem to have been districts to the south-east of the land of Canaan, occupied by different tribes of the Arabians, who lived in tents, and subsisted chiefly by feeding cattle, or by rapine. (Marg. Ref.)

30 Flee, * get you far off, [f] dwell deep, O ye inhabitants of Hazor, saith the LORD; [g] for Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon hath taken counsel against you, and hath conceived a purpose against you.

31 Arise, get you up unto the † wealthy nation, [b] that dwelleth without care, saith the LORD, which have neither gates nor bars, which [i] dwell alone.

32 And [k] their camels shall be a booty, and the multitude of their cattle a spoil: and [l] I will scatter into all winds them that are ‡ in the utmost corners; and I will bring their calamity from all sides thereof, saith the LORD.

33 And Hazor shall be [m] a dwelling for dragons, and a desolation for ever: there shall no man abide there, nor any son of man dwell in it.

34 [n] The word of the LORD, that came to Jeremiah the prophet against [n] Elam, in the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah king of Judah, saying, 35 Thus saith the LORD of hosts; behold, I will [o] break the bow of Elam, the chief of their might.

36 And upon Elam will I bring [p] the four winds from the four quarters of heaven, and will [q] scatter them toward all those winds; and there shall be no nation whither the outcasts of Elam shall not come.

37 For I will cause Elam [r] to be dismayed before [s] their enemies, and before them that seek their life: and I will bring evil upon them, even my fierce anger, saith the LORD, and [t] I will send the sword after them, till I have consumed them:

38 And I will [u] set my throne in Elam, and will destroy from thence the king and the princes, saith the LORD.

39 But it shall come to pass [x] in the latter days, that [y] I will bring again the captivity of Elam, saith the LORD.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—22.

The Lord notes down, and will call men to an account for, every instance of dishonesty; and especially for all their injustice to the destitute and orphans, who are not able to defend their own property. Power may for a time overcome right; but he will cause the injurious to make ample restitution for all their ill-gotten wealth, or he will distrain upon them for it. The commission of iniquity, nay, the connivance at it, by those in authority, causes the alarm of war with all its desolations to be heard in the land: and it is a serious inquiry, whether an account of this kind do not stand out against this nation, in respect of several of our foreign dependencies? and whether they may not be male heirs to our wealth in those parts, who have been unjustly deprived of their inheritances?—It is in vain for those who rebel against God, to glory in fruitful fields and flowing valleys, or to trust in fleets, armies, treasures, or advantageous situations. His terror can make even the stoutest to flee; and at his word, kings, princes, and priests, must go into captivity together. But, however the people of God may be plundered and injured, they will inherit the earth, and "the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the "just." Wisdom and counsel cannot be preserved from vanishing and perishing, when the time of God's visitation comes. By a blow or a fever the finest genius may be rendered an idiot, and the gravest statesman a lunatic. Even when the faculties are preserved, their counsels may be so infatuated, that they may appear as fools and madmen to all around them: and in short, without true piety there can be no valuable or durable wisdom. When the Lord lets loose victorious armies to spoil guilty nations, not only for the sake of plunder, but out of wanton cruelty; when the inhabitants are driven into, or hunted out of their fastnesses, and cut off by the devouring sword; the case of widows and fatherless children appears very deplorable. But the Lord hath given gracious intimations of his special care of them; and if the dying believer have neither friend nor brother to take charge of those whom he leaves behind; if he can make no provision for them, nor direct them to any earthly protection; he may be satisfied in hearing the Lord say to him, "Leave thy fatherless "children, and I will preserve them alive, and let thy "widows trust in me." This is a strong tower, into which the righteous may flee and be safe in every emergency; but no secret places can hide the sinner from the Lord. And if the children of God here drink the bitter cup of affliction, can prosperous rebels expect to escape altogether unpunished? Indeed, the Lord hath sworn by himself, that they shall drink the cup of his vengeance to

THE word that the LORD spake [a] against Babylon, and against the land of the Chaldeans, [b] by * Jeremiah the prophet.

2 [c] Declare ye among the nations, and publish, and † set up a standard; publish, and conceal not: say, [d] Babylon is taken, [e] Bel is confounded, [f] Merodach is broken in pieces; [g] her idols are confounded, her images are broken in pieces.

3 For [h] out of the north there cometh up a nation against her, [i] which shall make her land desolate, and none shall dwell therein: they shall remove, they shall depart, [k] both man and beast.

4 ¶ In [l] those days, and in that time, saith the LORD, [m] the children of Israel shall come, they and the children of Judah together, [n] going and weeping: they shall go, and [o] seek the LORD their God.

the very dregs, and wring them out; and that they shall become a reproach, and a curse, and a desolation. The Lord will make those small among the nations, and despised among men, who exalt themselves against him and his people. When nations grow formidable to their neighbours, and eminent in power and prosperity, their pride often deceives them; they deem themselves like the eagle, that hath made her nest in the top of the rock, and forget that the Lord can easily bring them down from thence. He is as powerful and as holy, as when he overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah: he can as easily destroy this guilty land, as he did those devoted cities, and make it an astonishment and an hissing to all that go by. It is therefore far safer to trust his promises, in the way of repentance and obedience, than to rely on our advantages and to commit iniquity. He can choose from the whole earth the most proper person for his work; or he can form one on purpose, as he pleases. Who then is like unto the LORD? Who can stand in judgment before him? "Who hath hardened his heart against him, "and prospered?" He needs not the powerful of the earth to execute his vengeance: when his purposes are to be fulfilled, the feeblest instrument can prevail against the most potent of his enemies; and the earth shall be moved at the sound of their fall, whilst their hearts melt, as the heart of a woman in her pangs.

V. 23—39.

Divine judgments continually go round from nation to nation: dismal tidings are heard: the earth is full of commotion, and cannot be quiet: admired and joyous cities are desolated, and their splendid palaces are consumed; and those that dwell in tents, and who have neither gates nor bars, cannot escape the rapacity of the executioners of divine vengeance. In all these events, the righteousness of God should be observed, amidst the violence and injustice of men. He sits on his throne judging right: by his judgments he shows his own holiness, and the evil of sin, and gives an earnest of the day of future righteous retribution. He thus calls sinners to repentance; he confirms the faith and hope of his people, and warneth them not to abuse his mercy: and they learn not to fear any purposes of man against them, when they can rejoice in the assurance, that "the LORD of hosts is with them, the God of "Jacob is their Refuge;" and to expect, that by all these convulsions and revolutions, way will be made for the more complete establishment of the Redeemer's kingdom, in the latter days, when peace, holiness, and truth, shall fill the whole earth.

NOTES.

CHAP. L. V. 1. The Chaldeans had been employed as the scourge of God against all the surrounding nations; but it was his purpose that they should be made a still more tremendous example of the power of his wrath and the truth of his word. Their crimes were more enormous than those of other nations; and they were the most grievous oppressors that Israel ever had. 'This follows the 'rest of the prophecies against the neighbouring countries, 'according to the method of God's judgments laid down 'before, (xxv.) where the prophet declares, that after 'Nebuchadnezzar and his successors had fulfilled God's 'purposes, in being the executioners of his vengeance 'upon other countries, they themselves should drink of 'the same cup. The prophecy has a further aspect on 'that mystical Babylon, mentioned in Revelations, and 'many of the expressions in it are applied by St. John to 'the downfall of Antichrist.' (Lowth.) (Notes, &c. Isaiah xiii. xiv. xxi. xxvi. xlvii. Rev. xiv—xix.)

By, &c. "By the ministry of Jeremiah." (Old Trans.)

V. 2, 3. (Note, Is. xlvi. 1, 2. Marg. Ref.) The ruin of Babylon was here predicted, as if it had already taken place. Notice was particularly taken of the destruction of the idols of Babylon; for that city was noted for her idols, and the immense treasures dedicated to them; and the Persians destroyed all images wherever they came, and plundered all the treasures contained in their temples: for they worshipped the sun under the emblem of fire; or, as some think, an invisible supreme God, under the external symbols of fire and of the sun. Chaldea lay to the north of Judea; but the Medes and Persians came from the north of Chaldea. The Pagan Roman empire was subverted by the northern nations; and probably the ruin of the antichristian powers will come upon them from the same quarter. The destruction of Babylon, which was begun by the Medes and Persians, became at length so entire, that it hath for ages been uninhabited by man, and deserted by every useful animal. This prophecy was delivered when Babylon was growing greater and more prosperous continually.

5 They shall [p] ask the way to Zion with their faces thitherward, saying, [q] Come, and let us join ourselves to the LORD [r] in a perpetual covenant, [s] that shall not be forgotten.

6 My [t] people hath been lost sheep: [u] their shepherds have caused them to go astray; they have turned them away [x] on the mountains; they have gone from mountain to hill; they [y] have forgotten their * resting place.

7 All that found them [z] have devoured them: and their adversaries said, [a] We offend not; because they have sinned against the LORD, [b] the Habitation of justice, even the LORD, [c] the Hope of their fathers.

8 Remove [d] out of the midst of Babylon, and go forth out of the land of the Chaldeans, and be as the he-goats before the flocks.

9 ¶ For, lo, [e] I will raise, and cause to come up against Babylon, an assembly of great nations from the north country: and [g] they shall set themselves in array against her: from thence she shall be taken; their arrows shall be of a mighty † expert man; [h] none shall return in vain.

10 And [i] Chaldea shall be a spoil: [k] all that spoil her shall be satisfied, saith the LORD.

11 Because [l] ye were glad, because ye rejoiced, O [m] ye destroyers of mine heritage; because [n] ye are grown ‡ fat as the heifer at grass, and ϕ bellow as bulls;

12 [o] Your mother shall be sore confounded; she that bare you shall be ashamed: behold, [p] the hindermost of the nations shall be [q] a wilderness, a dry land, and a desert.

13 Because of the wrath of the LORD it shall not be inhabited, but it shall be wholly desolate: [r] every one that goeth by Babylon shall be astonished, and hiss at all her plagues.

V. 4—6. The restoration of the Jews and many Israelites to their own land, was connected with the subversion of the Babylonish monarchy; and the more extensive spread of Christianity, attended with the conversion of the Jews, will be connected with the ruin of the new Testament Babylon: but some think that the future conversion of the Jews, and the restoration to their own land, is also predicted. The people are represented as convinced of their guilt, their duty, and their true interest: so that, weeping for their former sins, and for joy on account of their happy deliverance, they go to seek the Lord their God: they determine to leave Babylon and return to Zion, according to the liberty given them by Cyrus. Being unacquainted with the road, they inquire about it, as travellers who have turned their faces thitherward, being already set out and determined to proceed: and they invite their brethren to go with them, and encourage each other to go forward; that on Mount Zion they may join themselves to the Lord, and renew their acceptance and confirmation of his covenant, which was perpetually in force and obligatory; that (as persuaded he would not fail to perform it with them,) they might engage themselves not to forget to walk with him according to it. The covenant entered into by Josiah and the people, which was speedily forgotten and violated, may be referred to. Then the Lord mercifully considers the former sufferings of his people. Their rulers and teachers, who should have fed and tended them as the flock of God, had occasioned their dispersion, by seducing them to idolatry. 'They had turned 'them aside from the right worship of God at Jerusalem, 'to sacrifice to idols on mountains and high places.' (Lowth.) Thus they were exposed, as lost sheep, to be devoured by their enemies, who were like wolves and lions; and they had not thought of returning to their resting-place, to God, and his worship. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7, 8. The Chaldeans, having heard that the Lord was punishing the Jews for their sins against him, supposed that they did not offend by destroying them. They allowed, that he had in former times been the Habitation of justice, the sure Protector of the righteous, and the Hope of the fathers of the Jews: but they thought that he would not defend such wicked persons, or punish those who spoiled and murdered them; as if they had been free from sin, or as if they had sought the glory of God, or acted in obedience to his commandment and in support of his righteousness, when they fought against Israel! But as the Lord had now taken vengeance on these oppressors of his people, the Jews were ordered to leave Babylon; and the leading men to go before others, as the he-goats before the flock, without fearing any obstruction or opposition. 'Let every one strive to lead the way to others, and give 'them an example of speedily obeying God's call, without 'showing any fondness for the place, or the idolatries there 'practised.' (Lowth.)

V. 10. Satisfied. They shall be enriched by the plunder, and have as much as they can desire. The treasures accumulated at Babylon were immensely great.

V. 11. 'The Chaldeans were the executors of God's 'judgments on the Jews; but they were carried on purely 'by their own ambition and covetousness, though Provi-'dence directed their cruelties and oppressions to the ful-'filling its own ends and purposes.' (Lowth.) They insulted over the miseries of the Jews, and in their success against the worshippers of JEHOVAH; and they were become exceedingly prosperous and insolent.

V. 12, 13. Babylon was the mother-city, or metropolis, of 14 Put yourselves [s] in array against Babylon round about: all ye that [t] bend the bow, shoot at her, spare no arrows: [u] for she hath sinned against the LORD.

15 [x] Shout against her round about: [y] she hath given her hand: [z] her foundations are fallen, her walls are thrown down: [a] for it is the vengeance of the LORD: take vengeance upon her; [b] as she hath done, do unto her.

16 Cut off the sower from Babylon, and him that handleth the * sickle in the time of harvest: for fear of the oppressing sword [d] they shall turn every one to his people, and they shall flee every one to his own land.

17 ¶ Israel is [e] a scattered sheep, [f] the lions have driven him away: first the king of Assyria hath devoured him; and last [h] this Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon hath broken his bones.

18 Therefore thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Behold, I will punish the king of Babylon and his land, [i] as I have punished the king of Assyria.

19 And I will [k] bring Israel again to his habitation, and [l] he shall feed on Carmel and Bashan, and [m] his soul shall be satisfied upon [n] mount Ephraim and [o] Gilead.

20 [p] In those days, and in that time, saith the LORD, [q] the iniquity of Israel shall be sought for, and there shall be none; and the sins of Judah, and they shall not be found: for [r] I will pardon them whom I reserve.

21 ¶ Go [s] up against the land of † Merathaim, even against it, and against the inhabitants of ‡ Pekod: waste and utterly destroy after them, saith the LORD, [t] and do according to all that I have commanded thee.

the Chaldean empire. This was the greatest monarchy on earth at that time: yet the prophet called the Chaldeans the hindermost of the nations, either because of their wickedness, or in the prospect of the abject state to which they would be reduced; or as drinking last of the cup of vengeance, which he had been directed to send to the nations, (xxv. 26.) The words may mean "She shall be the hin-"dermost of the nations, a wilderness," &c. Isaiah predicted, that "Babylon should be pools of water," (Is. xiv. 23:) here it is foretold, that she should be "a dry land "and a desert." At first, the overflowing of the Euphrates reduced the adjacent country to a fen or marsh: but there is some ground to think, that in process of ages, and by the changes thus gradually produced, Jeremiah's prediction also was literally fulfilled; as well as in the entire desolations of the city. (Note, li. 61—64.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 14. Sinned. 'She hath been, in a remarkable 'manner, an enemy to God's truth and people. This 'may be especially applied to the mystical Babylon.' (Lowth.) 'Though the Lord called the Babylonians his 'servants, and their work his work; yet, because they did 'it not to glorify God, but for their own malice, and to 'profit themselves, it is here called sin.'

V. 15. Given, &c. Either as entering into a confederacy with other nations to defend herself against the predicted vengeance; or rather as surrendering to the conqueror, as captives give their hands to be bound. Though Cyrus did not destroy the walls of Babylon, yet he began to execute that vengeance of God, which continued to be inflicted, till her walls and foundations were totally destroyed. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 16. 'Babylon was more like a country walled in, 'than a city; her walls being sixty miles in circumference, 'according to Herodotus; forty eight according to Strabo. '—Within this circuit, a great deal of ground was taken 'up in corn-fields; so that they had corn enough growing 'within the walls to maintain a siege, as Q. Curtius 'asserts.' (Lowth.) The slaughter of the husbandmen, therefore, and the consequent neglect of agriculture, would increase the miseries of the inhabitants, and hasten the ruin of the city. The reader must recollect, that not only the taking of Babylon by Cyrus, but all the subsequent sieges and calamities of that city, terminating in her utter desolation, are here predicted.

For fear. This is spoken of the allies and hired soldiers of Babylon. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 17. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 18. Either the destruction of Sennacherib's army, and his death by the hand of his sons; or the destruction of Nineveh, as foretold by Jonah, Nahum, and Zephaniah, is here referred to. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 20. The Jews never relapsed, after the captivity, into those idolatries, which had been their great national offence, and had exposed them to their sufferings. This and their other national guilt were repented of, pardoned, and blotted out; so that they could no more be found. But the words can be applied in their full meaning to none but true believers, the spiritual Israel, whose sins are all buried in the depth of the sea, so that none can lay any thing to their charge, or find any unpardoned or unmortified sin in them. The passage implies a prediction of the future conversion of the Jews to Christ, and their full participation of all the blessings of his Gospel. 'In all 'the judgments God brings upon his people, he promises 'to reserve a remnant. St. Paul calls it "a remnant "according to the election of grace." (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 21. (Margin.) Merathaim, signifies rebels, and Pekod, visitation. But Pekod is spoken of as the name of a country or city belonging to Babylon, (Ez. xxiii. 23.)

22 A [u] sound of battle is in the land, and of great destruction.

23 How [x] is the hammer of the whole earth cut asunder and broken! how is Babylon become a desolation among the nations!

24 I have laid a snare for thee, and thou art also taken, O Babylon, [y] and thou wast not aware: thou art found, and also caught, [z] because thou hast striven against the LORD.

25 The LORD hath [a] opened his armoury, and hath brought forth the weapons of his indignation: for [b] this is the work of the Lord GOD of hosts in the land of the Chaldeans.

26 Come [c] against her from * the utmost border, [d] open her storehouses; † cast her up as heaps, and [e] destroy her utterly: let nothing of her be left.

27 Slay all her [f] bullocks; let them go down to the slaughter: woe unto them! for [g] their day is come, the time of their visitation.

28 The [h] voice of them that flee, and escape out of the land of Babylon, [i] to declare in Zion the vengeance of the LORD our God, the vengeance of his temple.

29 Call together [k] the archers against Babylon: all ye that bend the bow, camp against it round about; let none thereof escape: [l] recompense her according to her work; according to all that she hath done do unto her: [m] for she hath been proud against the LORD, against the Holy One of Israel.

30 Therefore shall [n] her young men fall in the streets, and [o] all her men of war shall be cut off in that day, saith the LORD.

31 Behold, [p] I am against thee, [q] O thou † most proud, saith the Lord GOD of hosts: [r] for thy day is come, the time that I will visit thee.

32 And ‡ the most proud [s] shall stumble and fall, and [t] none shall raise him up: and I will [u] kindle a fire in his cities, and it shall devour all round about him.

33 ¶ Thus saith the LORD of hosts; The children of Israel, and the children of Judah were oppressed together: [x] and and it is probable Merathaim was the same. The names, however, seem to have been selected, because of their signification. The time of visitation on the rebels is come.

According, &c. 'Those persons, whom God raises up 'to fulfil his decrees,—are said to perform his commands.' (Lowth.) Marg. Ref.)

V. 23. Hammer. That oppressive empire which "smote the nations with a continual stroke." (Lowth)—Babylon had been used as a hammer to break in pieces the nations, in all that part of the earth; and was found too hard and heavy to be resisted by them: but this hammer would soon be broken in pieces by the Medes and Persians, to the astonishment of all the surrounding countries.

V. 24. Cyrus took Babylon by surprise, when neither the king nor the inhabitants had the least expectation of such an event. His stratagem was successful, because God was pleased in this manner to show how vain and how fatal it is to strive against Him.

V. 25. 'God hath raised up enemies to subdue the 'Chaldeans,—and hath furnished them with all necessary 'provision for such an undertaking.' (Lowth.)

V. 26. Heaps. 'The marginal reading is to be preferred, "Tread her as heaps;"—as corn is trodden down 'when it is threshed.' (Lowth.)

V. 27. Bullocks, &c. The princes of Babylon had been living in prosperity and growing fat as bullocks, (11:) and they would very soon be led forth to the slaughter, continuing insensible of their danger to the last. Cyrus took Babylon, when they were all engaged in feasting and riot. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 28. The Jews, when liberated by Cyrus, returned to Jerusalem, and there celebrated the praises of God in fulfilling his word against Babylon: and from time to time, as further desolations were there made, many Jews, fleeing from that city and its neighbourhood, would carry the report to their brethren in Judea. (Note, li. 64.)

The vengeance, &c. The Chaldeans were guilty of the greatest impiety, in destroying the temple of God, as well as of cruelty and oppression upon the Jews, (7.) Belshazzar was profaning the vessels of the temple in the most blasphemous manner, when the hand-writing announced his destruction, (Dan. v.) and the ruin of the Chaldeans was the vengeance of God's temple, and the punishment of their enmity against him and his people.

V. 29. Do, &c. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 30. Gadatas and Gobrias, two of Cyrus's captains, when they had entered Babylon, marched, with the troops under their command, directly to the palace; and killing all they met, became masters of it, and slew Belshazzar also. (Xenophon.)

V. 31. The old translation renders this, "I come unto "thee, O proud man, &c." And this seems the real meaning of the passage. Belshazzar, the king of Babylon, is especially meant. Nebuchadnezzar had humbled himself before God, but Belshazzar had continued to magnify himself against him, till the hand-writing on the wall declared that his day was come, &c. (Notes, Dan. iv. v.)

V. 32. I will kindle, &c. 'This may be meant of 'the destructions made in the Babylonian territories, in 'the several expeditions Cyrus undertook against that 'monarchy, during the space of twenty years before the 'taking of Babylon,' (Lowth.) all that took them captives held them fast; [y] they refused to let them go.

34 Their [z] Redeemer is strong; The LORD of hosts is his name: he shall thoroughly [a] plead their cause, [b] that he may give rest to the land, and disquiet the inhabitants of Babylon.

35 ¶ A [c] sword is upon the Chaldeans, saith the LORD, and upon the inhabitants of Babylon, and [d] upon her princes, and upon [e] her wise men.

36 A sword is [f] upon the * liars, and they shall [g] dote: a sword is upon [h] her mighty men, and they shall be dismayed.

37 A sword is upon [i] their horses, and upon their chariots, and upon [k] all the mingled people that are in the midst of her; and they shall become [l] as women: a sword is upon [m] her treasures, and they shall be robbed.

38 A drought is upon [n] her waters; and they shall be dried up: for it is [o] the land of graven images, and they are [p] mad upon their idols.

39 Therefore [q] the wild beasts of the desert, with the wild beasts of the islands, shall dwell there, and the owls shall dwell therein; and it shall be no more inhabited for ever; neither shall it be dwelt in from generation to generation.

40 As [r] God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah and the neighbour-cities thereof, saith the LORD; so shall no man abide there, neither shall any son of man dwell therein.

41 Behold, [s] a people shall come from the north, and a great nation, and many kings shall be raised up from the coasts of the earth.

42 They shall [t] hold the bow and the lance: [u] they are cruel, and will not shew mercy: [x] their voice shall roar like the sea, and they [y] shall ride upon horses, every one put in array, like a man to the battle, against thee, O daughter of Babylon.

43 The [z] king of Babylon hath heard the report of them, and his hands waxed feeble: anguish took hold of him, and [a] pangs as of a woman in travail.

44 Behold, he shall come up [b] like a lion from the swelling of Jordan unto the habitation of the strong: but I will make them suddenly run away from her: and [c] who is a chosen man, that I may appoint over her? for who is like me? and who will † appoint me the time? and [d] who is that shepherd that will stand before me?

45 Therefore [e] hear ye the counsel of the LORD, that he hath taken against Babylon: and his purposes, that he hath purposed against the land of the Chaldeans: Surely [f] the least of the flock shall draw them out: surely he shall make their habitation desolate with them.

46 At [g] the noise of the taking of Babylon the earth is moved, and the cry is heard among the nations.

V. 39, 40. (Marg. Ref. Note, li. 64.)

V. 42. (Marg. Ref.) It is probable, from this account of the cruelty manifested by the Medes and Persians, that Xenophon's encomiums on Cyrus, for clemency as well as other virtues, were rather a declaration of what he thought a great prince should be, than a just estimate of Cyrus's character.

V. 44, 45. (Note, xlix. 19, 20. The same expressions, that were before used concerning the king of Babylon, as the executioner of the vengeance of God on Edom, are here used of Cyrus, as employed in the same service against Babylon.

CHAP. LI.

Further predictions of terrible judgments on Babylon, for her enormous wickedness, 1—58. Seraiah is ordered to take this prophecy to Babylon, and to read it there; and then to sink the book in the Euphrates, as a sign that Babylon should thus fall, and rise no more, 59—64.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

The longer God delays his judgments, the heavier they will fall on those who go on to treasure up wrath against the day of righteous retribution. His servants must not hesitate to declare his threatenings to the most prosperous sinners; either from fear of their frown, hope of their favour, or even gratitude for their kindness. The ruin of those who have been the supports of idolatry, infidelity, superstition, or impiety, is necessary, in order to the revival of true godliness, and the more general propagation of Christianity: and the prophecies of Scripture may yield great comfort to the believer, in this view of them. It should not be concealed, but published to all the nations, that the great seat of anti-christian tyranny, idolatry, and superstition, and the grand persecutor of true Christians, is as certainly doomed to destruction as ancient Babylon was; and that all her idols will be broken, and her abominations buried in her ruins: for the Lord will cause his standard to be set up, and the instruments of his anger will be gathered together, to render her land desolate, that none may dwell therein. Then will vast multitudes learn to mourn for sin, and to seek the Lord, and join themselves to him according to his new and everlasting covenant; then will the lost sheep of the house of Israel be brought back into the fold of the good Shepherd, and stray no more. In the mean time, let us rejoice that there is a remnant in every age, who seek him with weeping and supplication; especially, if we be conscious that we are of the number.—They, that would find acceptanee with him, must come to his mercy-seat, through the heavenly Advocate: if not acquainted with this new and living way to Zion, they should inquire after it, by reading the word of God and praying for his Spirit; they should also attend the instructions, and seek the counsel, of pious ministers, and cultivate the acquaintance of experienced Christians. Above all, they should "set their faces thitherward," and walk in the ways of God, as far as they have learned them: for it is absurd and impious to pretend to inquire the way to heaven, whilst men continue in that course of life which they are conscious tends to hell. They that have got some knowledge of the way should be always ready to give instructions to inquirers. Nor ought we willingly to travel the road alone: nay, we should press others to attend us; and desire that both we and they may be joined to the Lord in the most intimate union, as his redeemed servants and worshippers. If we be reconciled to him, according to the tenour of his new covenant by faith in Christ, the blessings will be perpetually, yea, eternally secured to us: our God will never forget his own engagements; and we should continually beseech him not to leave us to forget the duties of our relation to him. Then we shall no more be as "lost sheep, who have forgotten their resting-place," and exposed to the great devourer of souls; but we shall find rest and safety in God, the Habitation of justice, and the Hope of all the generations of Israel. Nor will he leave us to those wretched shepherds, who cause their flocks to go astray by false doctrine and corrupt examples; or who leave them to wander in ignorance and error, through sloth and negligence; but he will himself feed us with knowledge and understanding. The sins of professing Christians do not excuse the enmity, injustice, and cruelty of those who rejoice in destroying the heritage of God. He that will not save his people in their sins, will never countenance the wickedness of his open enemies, who upbraid them with their crimes, and then commit still viler abominations. We should avail ourselves of opportunities given us of separating more entirely from ungodly persons, and idolatrous and corrupt professors of the Gospel. Every one should be prompt in taking the lead, and setting the example, in such pious singularity: and they, whose office or rank gives them pre-eminence, should be as the he-goats before the flocks.

V. 9—46.

How earnest ought we to be in choosing and securing that good part, that can never be taken from us! For worldly possessions often render men a more desirable and satisfying spoil to the sons of rapine and violence: and they that were chief soon become the hindermost, because of the wrath of the Lord. When he arises to render to sinners according as they have done, accumulated miseries come upon them from every quarter; and every comfort and helper fails and vanishes. Indeed, the people of God seem to fall a defenceless prey to their foes; and one king or nation after another scatters them, as the lion doth the helpless sheep: thus they devour and torment them; they break their bones on racks, burn them in fires, immure them in dungeons, or reduce them to cruel bondage, and refuse to let them go. But persecutors of every age may read their certain doom, in what befel the Assyrians and Chaldeans of old: for "the Redeemer of Israel is strong, "the Lord of Hosts is his name," and he will thoroughly plead their cause, and give them rest, and feed them in his green pastures, and satisfy them with his abundant consolations. He will pardon those whom he reserves, and for ever bury their sins in oblivion, and be propitious to his chosen remnant. But his enemies, after having perhaps been employed as his hammer to dash in pieces their fellow-criminals, will themselves be broken in pieces: they will be taken in a snare, when they least suspect it: their treasures will he robbed, and they led away as fatted bullocks for the slaughter: for it is the work of God, against whom they have dared to contend. The vengeance of his broken law is terrible: and that of his despised or abused Gospel still more so; but the vengeance of his temple, the punishment of those who have used all their power to put down his worship and extirpate his people, is most tremendous:

THUS saith the LORD; Behold, [a] I will raise up against Babylon, and against them that dwell in the * midst of them that [b] rise up against me, [c] a destroying wind;

2 And will send unto Babylon [d] fanners, that shall fan her, and shall empty her land: for [e] in the day of trouble they shall be against her round about.

3 Against him that bendeth, [f] let the archer bend his bow, and against him that lifteth himself up in his [g] brigandine: and [h] spare ye not her young men; destroy ye utterly all her host.

4 Thus the slain shall fall in the land of the Chaldeans, and they that are [i] thrust through in her streets.

5 For [k] Israel hath not been forsaken, nor Judah of his God, of the LORD of hosts; [l] though their land was filled with sin against the Holy One of Israel.

6 Flee [m] out of the midst of Babylon, and deliver every man his soul: be not cut off in her iniquity; [n] for this is the time of the LORD'S vengeance; he will render unto her a recompense.

7 Babylon hath been [o] a golden cup in the LORD'S hand, that made all the earth drunken; [p] the nations have drunken of her wine; therefore the nations [q] are mad.

8 Babylon is [r] suddenly fallen and destroyed: [s] howl for her; [t] take balm for her pain, if so be she may be healed.

9 We would have healed Babylon, but she is not healed: [u] forsake her, and let us go every one into his own country: for [x] her judgment reacheth unto heaven: and is lifted up even to the skies.

10 The LORD hath [y] brought forth our righteousness; come, and [z] let us declare in Zion the work of the LORD our God.

11 [a] Make † bright the arrows; gather the shields: [b] the LORD hath raised up the spirit of the kings of the Medes, for [c] his device is against Babylon, to destroy it; because it is the vengeance of the LORD, [d] the vengeance of his temple.

and it will be far more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment, than for them. From the judgments denounced against prosperous Babylon, and the mercies promised to afflicted Israel, we should learn to choose affliction with the people of God, rather than the pleasures of sin for a season. And in the exact accomplishment which hath taken place of these ancient predictions, we may be encouraged to expect, with realizing faith, the performance of all the promises and prophecies of the sacred Scriptures: for "heaven and earth shall pass away, but "the words of our Lord shall not pass away."

NOTES.

CHAP. LI. V. 1, (Note, iv. 11, 12.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2. 'As the wind drives and scatters chaff in a 'threshing floor, so shall the Persian armies make a per-'fect riddance of every thing that is valuable.' (xv, 7.) (Lowth.)

V. 3. "He that bendeth his bow, shall bend it no "more, nor exalt himself in his brigandine," &c. Thus some render the verse.

V. 5. "For Israel hath not been a widow," &c. (Old Trans.) Though Israel and Judah had been sharply corrected for the iniquities with which they had filled the land, their enemies should find that they were not left as a friendless widow, to be oppressed with impunity.

V. 6. The Jews were ordered to leave Babylon, (as Lot left Sodom,) lest they should be involved in her calamities, or corrupted by her idolatries. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7. The great splendour and prosperity of Babylon are denoted by the term golden: as the extensive desolations occasioned by the victorious arms of Nebuchadnezzar, and the idolatries he propagated, are represented by a cup in the hand of God to intoxicate the nations and make them mad. 'Babylon has recommended her idolatries to the 'world by several specious pretences, as well as by her 'authority and example, so that they have been like 'poison set off by a golden cup, which hath enticed men 'to drink, without being aware of the danger; and all this 'by God's permission, in order to the accomplishing some 'great ends of his providence. The sense of this verse is 'applied by St. John to spiritual Babylon, which hath 'used the most plausible methods to disguise her idolatrous 'practices.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 8. Take &c. (Marg. Ref.) 'This is spoken ironi-'cally, implying that her ruin is irrecoverable.' (Lowth.)

V. 9. The allies of Babylon did what they could to prevent her ruin; but, finding it in vain, they determined to shift for themselves: for they saw the hand of God lifted up against her; and that her judgment was to be made manifest to all men, as those objects are most conspicuous that reach very high. Some understand it of the prophets and servants of God, who had sufficiently testified against the crimes and idolatries of Babylon, and must now leave her to the most dreadful and manifest judgments of God.

V. 10. By the vengeance of God on Babylon, it was manifested that the Jewish nation had been unjustly oppressed by the Chaldeans: and that theirs was indeed the true religion, and their cause righteous, as far as man was concerned. (5.) 'Therefore we ought to give glory to 'him, in the assemblies of the Church, and in the most 'public manner imaginable.' (Lowth.)

'alliance against the Medes, Cambyses sent his son Cyrus, 'with an army of thirty thousand Persians, to join the 'Medes, commanded by Cyaxares. Cyaxares, king of 'Media, (called Darius the Mede in Scripture,) was Cyrus's uncle; and it was properly his army that made the 'expedition against the Babylonians, he employing Cyrus 'as his general. Persia was of little account, till Cyrus 'made a figure in the world.' (Lowth.)

V. 12. Let the Chaldeans make every preparation for war and for the defence of Babylon, their efforts would be in vain; for the Lord would certainly fulfil his predictions against them.

V. 13. Upon, &c. 'Upon the Euphrates, which 'encompassed Babylon and ran through it; and by means 'of which it thought itself impregnable. Many waters 'do likewise mystically signify the many people, over 'which this was the reigning city.'

Measure. 'God has put a bound to thy covetousness, 'which it shall not go beyond.' (Lowth.)

V. 14. The original is remarkable, "I have sworn by "my own soul," or life; "As I live, saith the LORD." (Marg. Ref.)

V. 15—19. (Note, x. 12—16.) 'This is a powerful 'argument to encourage our trust in God, and to assure 'us that he will in due time assert his own authority, 'against all the encroachments of idolatry and false religions.' (Lowth.)

V. 20—24. Some understand these verses of Cyrus, whom God would employ to execute his dreadful sentence upon Babylon and the Chaldeans; but others suppose, that Babylon, or the king of Babylon, is spoken of as the battle-axe by whom God would break in pieces the nations: (Notes, xxv.) and that after he had thus accomplished his purposes, he would execute vengeance on Babylon and the Chaldeans, for all the evil done in Zion, as well as for all their idolatries and iniquities. 'Or else 'the words may be understood of the Church, and imply, 'that God will destroy all those powers and kingdoms, 'which are adversaries to his people and truth. This will 'be fulfilled at the fall of mystical Babylon, when God's 'kingdom shall break in pieces all the kingdoms of the 'earth, in the destruction of that remnant of the fourth 'monarchy.' (Dan. ii. 44. Mic. v. 3—15. Zech. xii. 3—6.)

—In your sight. This may either refer to the evil done at Zion by the Chaldeans, in the sight of God's worshippers, (who seem here addressed;) or the public manner in which judgment would be executed on Babylon.

stretch out mine hand upon thee, and roll thee down from the rocks, [k] and will make thee a burnt mountain.

26 And they [l] shall not take of thee a stone for a corner, nor a stone for foundations: but thou shalt be * desolate for ever, saith the LORD.

27 Set [m] ye up a standard in the land, blow the trumpet among the nations, prepare the nations against her, call together against her the kingdoms of [n] Ararat, Minni, and [o] Ashchenaz: appoint a captain against her; [p] cause the horses to come up as the rough caterpillars.

28 Prepare against her the nations with [q] the kings of the Medes, the captains thereof, and all the rulers thereof, and all the land of his dominion.

29 And [r] the land shall tremble and sorrow: for [s] every purpose of the LORD shall be performed against Babylon, to make the land of Babylon a desolation without an inhabitant.

30 The [t] mighty men of Babylon have forborne to fight, they have remained in their holds: their might hath failed; they became as women: they have burned her dwelling-places; [u] her bars are broken.

V. 25. Babylon stood in a plain: but the immense multitude of the buildings, and the height of the temples, walls, and towers, rendered the city as an artificial mountain. The destruction which was thence diffused to all the surrounding nations, rendered Babylon as a tremendous volcano: but at length the empire and city would be consumed, as it were, by fire; and the Lord would overturn and roll them down, as a burnt mountain, into the ocean, to be found no more. (Rev. viii. 8.)

—Destroying, &c. Or "corrupting mountain, which "corruptest the whole earth." 'Babylon was the seat of 'idolatry, from whence it was derived into other countries; 'which is remarkably true of mystical Babylon. (Rev. xvii. '5.) We do not find that Babylon was ever destroyed 'by fire: but that mystical Babylon shall be so destroyed 'is plain from Rev. xvii. 16. xviii. 8, 9.' (Lowth.)

V. 26. 'There shall not be left an entire stone fit for 'use.' (Lowth.) It is a figurative description of the most complete desolation; of being "swept with the "besom of destruction," as Isaiah has expressed it.

V. 27. (Marg. Ref.) 'Ararat and Minni are pro-'bably the same with the greater and lesser Armenia. 'Cyrus's first expedition in this war, was for reducing the 'Armenians who had revolted, who were obliged to 'send their usual quota of auxiliaries, to the carrying on of 'the war. But by Ashchenaz Bochart understands Phrygia 'and Troas; part of that country being called Ascania by 'Homer. Cyrus had conquered Crœsus, and several 'nations from the Egean sea to the Euphrates, before 'he marched against Babylon.' 'Xenophon informs us, 'that there were both Phrygians and Cappadocians in his 'army.' (Lowth.) Virgil calls the son of Æneas, the Trojan, Ascanius.

As, &c. That is, in immense multitudes destroying all before them. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 28. Kings. The princes or viceroys of the Median empire, or the kings that were allies and tributaries of the king of Media.

V. 30. 'Accordingly the Babylonians, after the loss 'of a battle or two, never recovered their courage to face 'the enemy in the field again: they retired within their 'walls; and the first time that Cyrus came with his army 'before the place, he could not provoke them to venture 'forth, and try the fortune of arms; and the last time 'that he came, he consulted with his officers about the 'best manner of carrying on the siege, since, saith he, 'they do not come forth and fight.' (Bp. Newton.)—The Chaldeans were very valiant, when the Lord used them as his hammer or battle-axe; but they became as women, when his vengeance was to be executed on them.

V. 31, 32. Cyrus having spent two years before Babylon, with little prospect of success, and even derided by the inhabitants, at length, having drained the river, divided his army into two parts, and marched them into the city at each end, by the channel of it; and through the brazen gates, at the ends of each street toward the river, which the riotous Babylonians had left open. When the Persians appeared in the city, messengers would immediately be sent to inform the king that the city was taken at one end, (not supposing that the other end was taken also;) and these would meet with one another, and increase the terror and confusion of the inhabitants: but it seems that the troops of Cyrus arrived at the palace before the messengers could inform the king of his danger. They were also to carry information, that the Persians had stopped the passages, and cut off the communication between one part of the city and another: that they had set the reeds on fire, and that the soldiers were so affrighted, as to be incapable of making any resistance. 'The 'word translated reeds properly signifies marshes or lakes. '—The enemy have burnt up all the outworks, belonging 'to the marshy grounds about the river.' 'Herodotus 'takes notice, that the extreme parts of the city were ta-'ken, before they who dwelt in the middle of it were sen-'sible of the danger.' (Lowth.)

V. 33. Babylon had crushed and trampled on the nations, and especially on the Jews, as the corn was trodden out on the threshing floor: and she was about to endure the like miseries herself. The riches of the nations, likewise, were collected into her, as the sheaves into the floor: but her crimes had made her ripe for divine vengeance; the time of her harvest was at hand; the whole would be carried away by her enemies, as the field is cleared at harvest, and the conquerors would be enriched by her spoils.

V. 34—37. Zion here complains to the Lord of the injuries she had sustained from the Chaldeans: they had devoured the substance, and destroyed the people of Judah; they had rendered Jerusalem like an empty vessel; and having gorged themselves, like some voracious animal, with all her precious stores, they cast her and her children out of the land, and carried them into captivity. But this violence done to the children of Zion, and their blood which had been shed, lay upon Babylon as a heavy load: and in avenging Zion, God would waste Babylon, and render it the residence of venomous and hateful creatures alone. (Marg. Ref.) By drying up the sea and springs of Babylon, the destruction of her people, and the total failure of all those resources whence she derived her immense riches, may be meant: and perhaps the draining of the Euphrates may be alluded to; as all great waters are called seas in Scripture.

V. 38—40. The drunken revels of the Chaldeans would be turned into hideous howlings, when they found their enemies in the midst of them. The Lord so ordered it, that they should be left at this crisis to inflame themselves with wine, at a feast observed in honour of their idols; that their clamorous rejoicing and intoxication might make way for Cyrus to destroy them when fallen asleep, and they should wake no more in this world. (Marg. Ref.) For thus God made them sacrifices to his awful justice: while they were exposed to the swords of their enemies, with as little consciousness of the doom which awaited them, as the animals had which were butchered or sacrificed.

V. 41. (Marg. Ref.) 'Babylon was esteemed the 'wonder of the world, for the height, breadth, and com-'pass of her walls, and the palace and hanging gardens 'belonging to it; for the temple of Belus; for the banks 'and facings of the river; and the artificial lakes and canals 'made for the draining of it.' (Lowth.)

V. 42. The multitude of the invaders who came against Babylon was as irresistible as the impetuous waves of the ocean: and her ruin would be as surprising as if the sea had quitted its channel, and had come up to destroy the city.

V. 43. (Note, l. 12—32.) Babylon, and all the adjacent regions, would become uninhabited, uncultivated, and unproductive, like a barren desert.

V. 44. Bel was the chief idol of Babylon, and the destruction of his temple and his worshippers was as his punishment; and doubtless was a heavy punishment to those ambitious spirits, whom all idolaters worship. The immense treasures of his temple, which had been accumulating for ages, became the property of the conquerors. (Note, l. 2, 3. (Marg. Ref.) 'The heathen ascribed the honour of all 'their successes to their idols; and upon any great vic-'tory, offered the best part of their spoils to their gods, and 'deposited them in their temples. The restoring of the 'holy vessels to their right owner is here particularly fore-'told, which was done by Cyrus, upon his proclamation 'for rebuilding the temple. Xerxes demolished the temple

45 My people, [c] go ye out of the midst of her, and [d] deliver ye every man his soul from the fierce anger of the LORD.

46 And * lest your heart faint, and ye fear for the rumour that shall be heard in the land; [e] a rumour shall both come one year, and after that in another year shall come a rumour, and violence in the land, [f] ruler against ruler.

47 Therefore, behold, the days come, that [g] I will † do judgment upon the graven images of Babylon: and [h] her whole land shall be confounded, and all her slain shall fall in the midst of her.

48 Then [i] the heaven and the earth, and all that is therein, shall sing for Babylon: for [k] the spoilers shall come unto her from the north, saith the LORD.

'of Belus, and plundered it of its vast wealth, which is 'computed to have amounted to twenty-one millions of our 'money. There shall be no more costly presents brought 'by foreign nations to the temple of Bel. Just as, under 'the Roman empire, people that were conquered sent 'golden crowns to Jupiter Capitolinus.' (Lowth.)

V. 45. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 46. Lest the sudden destruction of the city where they resided should terrify the Jews, the Lord intended to prepare them for it. Rumours would reach them, one year after another, of Cyrus's intended invasion: and by comparing the wars, insurrections, and revolts which took place, with these predictions, they might learn to consider such events as the forerunners of their own deliverance. (Notes, Luke, xxi. 20—28.) 'Meaning, that Babylon 'should not be destroyed all at once; but by little and 'little should be brought to nothing. For the first year 'came the tidings, the next year the siege, and in the third 'year, it was taken: yet this is not the horrible destruc-'tion, which the prophets threatened in many places; for 'that was, when after this they rebelled, and Darius over-'came them by the policy of Zopyrus, and hanged three 'thousand of superior rank.' (Notes, 61—64.)

V. 47. 'Taking this prophecy in its full extent, it com-'prises the fall of mystical Babylon, which is represented, 'both here and in the parallel passages of Isaiah and the 'Revelation, as a decisive stroke, which should thoroughly 'vindicate the cause of oppressed truth and innocence, and 'put a final period to idolatry, and to all the oppressions of 'God's people.' (Lowth.)

V. 48, 49. The earth. (Marg. Ref.) The regions which constituted this vast empire, which was spoken of as the whole earth or world, as the Roman empire afterwards was.

V. 50, 51. The Jews who had escaped during all their preceding sufferings, and who escaped the sword when Babylon was taken, were again exhorted to leave Babylon, to think of the Lord and of his temple, though they were far off from Jerusalem; and to make haste to return thither. To which they answered, that they were covered with shame, because of the reproach they lay under whilst their holy places had been profaned, destroyed, and trampled on by strangers.

V. 53. (Note, 47.) The builders of Babel, (or Babylon,) meant to build a tower, whose top should reach to heaven; and so the walls of Babylon were of prodigious and almost incredible height and strength. It appears from the testimony of those who had been upon the spot, that the walls were three hundred and fifty feet in height, and eighty seven in thickness, and sixty miles in circuit; with towers still higher and stronger, at proper distances: and though there is some difference in the account given by different authors, yet all agree that the fortifications of Babylon were unparalleled. Depending on these, and the plenty of provisions that were in the city, the inhabitants derided the besiegers. But God had sent them, and they were sure to prevail. (9.)

V. 55. The multitude, tumult, and boastings of the inhabitants of Babylon made a noise like the waves of the sea: but in process of time it was to be succeeded by entire solitude and silence; except as interrupted by the noise of doleful birds and venomous creatures.

58 Thus saith the LORD of hosts; [h] The * broad walls of Babylon shall be utterly † broken, and her [i] high gates shall be burned with fire; and [k] the people shall labour in vain, and the folk in the fire, and they shall be weary.

60 So Jeremiah [m] wrote in a book all the evil that should come upon Babylon, even all these words that are written against Babylon.

61 And Jeremiah said to Seraiah, When thou comest to Babylon, [n] and shalt see, and shalt [o] read all these words;

62 Then shalt thou say, O LORD, thou hast spoken against this place, [p] to cut it off, that none shall remain in it, neither man nor beast, but that it shall be ‖ desolate for ever.

63 And it shall be, when thou hast made an end of reading this book, that [q] thou shalt bind a stone to it, and cast it into the midst of Euphrates:

64 And thou shalt say, [r] Thus shall Babylon sink, and shall not rise from the evil that I will bring upon her: and [s] they shall be weary. [t] Thus far are the words of Jeremiah.

V. 58. The labour and expense, beyond all computation, that had been employed in erecting the stupendous wall and towers of Babylon, and forming the massy brazen gates, in which numbers had laboured as in the fire, and been wearied even unto death, would all in the event be found vain and useless. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 59. With, &c. "For," or "in behalf of, Zedekiah."

Quiet. Some interpret this word, of Seraiah's office under Zedekiah; but perhaps it refers to his character as a peaceable and pious man; who, (though employed by Zedekiah on some embassy to Babylon,) was ready to perform this service put upon him by the prophet. Seraiah was brother to Baruch. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 61—64. When Seraiah had surveyed the strength, magnificence, prosperity, luxury, pride, and wickedness of this flourishing city, he was ordered to read (probably before the captive Jews,) all the words of this prophecy concerning its entire and final ruin and desolation: and then, to give the greater solemnity to the transaction, and to show his belief of what he had read, he was to sink the book in the Euphrates; declaring that thus Babylon would fall and rise no more: for its inhabitants would be like men fainting with weariness, who can no more resist their assailants. Babylon was in the full height of her prosperity, when this declaration was made, and these predictions could scarcely escape the notice either of the Jews or the Chaldeans at that time, though the event rendered them more generally regarded.

Thus far. The next chapter seems to have been added by Ezra, or some other person, to illustrate the predictions of Jeremiah, (which are here terminated,) and the lamentations which follow. (Note, 46.) It may be proper very briefly to state a few particulars, concerning the gradual fulfilment of this extraordinary prophecy. 'Notwithstanding these precautions,' (those used by Cyrus to prevent a revolt of the Babylonians,) 'they rebelled against 'Darius; and in order to hold out to the last extremity, 'they took all their women, and each man choosing one 'of them, out of his own family, they strangled the rest, 'with their children also, that unnecessary mouths might 'not consume their provisions. They sustained the siege 'for twenty months. As soon as Darius had made himself master of the place, he ordered three thousand of the 'principal men to be crucified, and thereby fulfilled the 'prophecies of the cruelty, which the Medes and Persians 'should use towards the Babylonians.' B. C. 516. (Bp. Newton.) After this, 1. 'Babylon ceased to be a royal 'city, the kings of Persia choosing to reside elsewhere.—'They delighted more in Shushan, Ecbatana, Persepolis, '&c. and did themselves destroy a good part of Babylon. 2. We are informed by Strabo and Pliny, 'that the Macedonians, who succeeded the Persians,—'built Seleucia in the neighbourhood, on purpose to draw 'away its inhabitants, and to have it deserted. Nothing 'can better explain what the prophet had foretold, "It "shall not be inhabited." 'Its own masters endeavour 'to depopulate it!' B. C. 293. 3. 'The new kings of Persia, who afterwards became masters of Babylon, completed the ruin of it by building Ctesiphon, which carried 'away all the inhabitants she had left: so that from the 'time the anathema was denounced on that city, it seems 'as if those very persons, who ought to have protected her, 'were become her enemies; as if they had all thought it 'their duty to reduce her to a state of solitude, by indirect 'means, without using any violence. 4. She was so totally 'forsaken, that nothing was remaining but the walls,—'when Pausanias wrote his remarks on Greece, (A. D. 96.) '5. The king of Persia, finding the place deserted, made 'a park of it, in which they kept wild beasts for hunting, 'A. D. 400. The site of Babylon could not have been 'entirely a marsh, or pools of water, at this time.' (Note.

'l. 12, 13.) 6. At length the walls of Babylon fell 'down, and were never repaired. The animals, which 'served for pleasure to the Persian kings, abandoned the 'place: serpents and scorpions remained. The Euphra-'tes, having no longer a free channel, took its course an-'other way. 7. By means of all these changes Babylon 'became an utter desert so that the most able geogra-'phers at this day cannot determine where it stood.' (Rollin's Ancient History.) This prophecy, the latest of those delivered against Babylon, has been extant two thousand four hundred years; and all historians, travellers, and geographers, (the persons in all the world the most capable of knowing,) whether Jews, infidels, or Christians; whether papists or protestants, agree that the state of those regions at this day exactly accords with it! So certainly, also, shall the prophecies against the New Testament-Babylon be accomplished.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—32.

When they that have prospered sink into trouble, those professed friends, who were only attached to their prosperity, often set themselves against them round about: but the Lord is a Friend who changes not, and is especially kind to his people in adversity. Such as delight in war and blood, generally perish by others as bloody as themselves: but "blessed are the peace-makers, for they shall "be called the children of God." He will punish his offending worshippers; but that does not excuse their oppressors: for though the land of Canaan was filled with sin against the holy One of Israel; yet the king and people of Babylon had no right to seize upon it, and destroy its inhabitants. The Lord will therefore bring forth the righteousness of those who have been unjustly oppressed; and will plead the cause of his people against those who slander, enslave, or spoil them: and if we have waited for him, and are helped, we should come and declare in Zion his work in our behalf. When he devises evil against sinners, he will easily raise up the spirits of his chosen instruments, that he may effect it: and they that would deliver their own souls, must separate without delay from among the workers of iniquity. The splendid achievements of mighty conquerors, and the majesty of haughty monarchs and oppressive empires, only renders them a golden cup in the Lord's hand, to make the nations mad and miserable: and too often idolatry and iniquity have spread, in proportion to the enlargement of flourishing monarchies. But these have their rise, progress, continuance, and decline: some of them gradually decay; others fall, and are destroyed suddenly and irreparably; and the just judgments of God are conspicuous to all beholders, in their ruin. When riches and prosperity are depended on, and no end is put to men's desires of increasing their possessions, severe calamities may be expected to assign a measure to their insatiable covetousness, and to tear from them their idolized treasures. What idol or created arm can withstand the Creator and Upholder of the world; who is also the Portion of his people! He is able to save and to destroy; and whatever use he makes of ungodly men, he will execute vengeance on them at last; but they who trust, love, and serve him, shall be graciously protected and recompensed.

V. 33—64.

Whilst God avenges all injustice and oppression, the violence done to the saints and marytrs of Jesus will draw down the heaviest load of vengeance: and in bringing sinners to condign punishment, he needs only leave them to their lusts, and they will make way for their own destruction. Drunken revels and sensual mirth are awful preparations for death; and if men would not fall asleep amidst such excesses, to awake no more but in eternal ruin, they ought not to indulge in them. The wars and desolations which pervade the earth should cause our hearts to mourn; but not to faint or fear: for though violence be in the land, and ruler against ruler, and tremendous slaughter be made, yet the Lord presides, and is preparing to execute judgment on the enemies of his cause, that heaven and earth may sing his praise. We may indeed yet complain of reproach and shame; because the sanctuaries of his house are possessed and profaned by those who are strangers and enemies to his truth and grace: but let us still remember the Lord our God, and pray for the promised and not far distant peace of Jerusalem: let us use every means that he hath appointed, to promote the cause of genuine Christianity; and confidently expect, that Babylon and every Antichrist will soon sink and rise no more for ever. We need not be dismayed at the haughtiness, prosperity, or power of the wicked; or at the prospect of mountainous difficulties in our way: for there is nothing too hard for the Lord. Let us then hope in his word, and quietly wait for his salvation: and then we shall see, but never share, the destruction of the wicked that rise up against us.

the eyes of the LORD, [d] according to all that Jehoiakim had done.

3 For [e] through the anger of the LORD, it came to pass in Jerusalem and Judah, till he had cast them out from his presence, that [f] Zedekiah rebelled against the king of Babylon.

4 ¶ And it came to pass in [g] the ninth year of his reign, [h] in the tenth month, in the tenth day of the month, that Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon came, he and all his army, against Jerusalem, and [i] pitched against it, and built forts against it round about.

5 So the city was besieged unto the eleventh year of king Zedekiah.

6 And in [k] the fourth month, in the ninth day of the month, [l] the famine was sore in the city, so that there was no bread for the people of the land.

7 Then [m] the city was broken up, and [n] all the men of war fled, and went forth out of the city by night, by the way of the gate between the two walls, which was by the king's garden; (now the Chaldeans were by the city round about:) and they went by the way of the plain.

8 But the army of the Chaldeans pursued after the king, [o] and overtook Zedekiah in the plains of Jericho; and all his army was scattered from him.

9 Then [p] they took the king, and carried him up unto the king of Babylon to [q] Riblah, in the land of [r] Hamath; where he gave judgment upon him.

10 And the king of Babylon [s] slew the sons of Zedekiah before his eyes: [t] he slew also all the princes of Judah in Riblah.

11 Then [u] he * put out the eyes of Zedekiah, and the king of Babylon bound him in † chains, and carried him to Babylon, and put him in ‡ prison till the day of his death.

12 ¶ Now in the [x] fifth month, in the tenth day of the month, which was [y] the nineteenth year of Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon, came Nebuzar-adan, ◊ captain of the guard, which ‖ served the king of Babylon, into Jerusalem, 13 And [z] burned the house of the LORD, and [a] the king's house; and all the houses of Jerusalem, and all the houses of the great men, burned he with fire.

14 And all the army of the Chaldeans, that were with the captain of the guard, [b] brake down all the walls of Jerusalem round about.

15 Then Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard [c] carried away captive certain of the poor of the people, and the residue of the people that remained in the city, and those that fell away, that fell to the king of Babylon, and the rest of the multitude.

16 But Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard left [d] certain of the poor of the land, for vine-dressers, and for husbandmen.

17 ¶ Also the [e] pillars of brass that were in the house of the LORD, and [f] the bases, and the brazen sea that was in the house of the LORD, the Chaldeans brake, and carried all the brass of them to Babylon.

18 The [g] caldrons also, and * the shovels, and [h] the snuffers, [i] and the † bowls, and [k] the spoons, and all the vessels of brass wherewith they ministered, took they away.

19 And the basons, and the ‡ firepans, and the bowls, and the caldrons, [l] and the candlesticks, and the spoons, and the cups; that which was of gold in gold, and that which was of silver in silver, took the captain of the guard away.

20 The [m] two pillars, one sea, and twelve brazen bulls that were under the bases, which king Solomon had made in the house of the LORD: ◊ the brass of all these vessels was [n] without weight.

'bishop Usher supposes, that this, and the two following 'verses, give us an account of the lesser captivities which 'the Jews suffered under Nebuchadnezzar: whereas there 'were three others, in which many more persons were 'carried away; viz. in the first year of his reign, (Dan. 'i. 3.) in the eighth year, (2 Kings xxiv. 12.) and in 'the nineteenth, when the city was destroyed.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref)

V. 30. This event is no where else mentioned: but it seems that a remnant continued, dispersed in different parts of the land, after Johanan retired into Egypt; and perhaps some escaped from Egypt and joined them: but Nebuchadnezzar at length carried them away also. On any supposition, the numbers mentioned, as carried captive, must appear small, compared with the immense population of the land in preceding times: but it is probable, that many more were removed into other countries, by one means or other: and the miseries and massacres of the Jews seem to have been very tremendous, previous to this catastrophe.

V. 31. Twenty-fifth. (Note, 2 Kings xxv. 27—30.) 'This advancement might be resolved upon on the twenty-'fifth, but not brought to pass till the twenty-seventh.' (Lowth.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When nations provoke God to give them up to ruin, he leaves their princes to infatuated counsels, which bring deserved punishment on themselves and their subjects. Would we then have wise and successful rulers, we must pray for them, and study ourselves to walk conscientiously before God. When sinners follow one another in the ways of rebellion, it may be expected that God will follow them with similar judgments. Ringleaders in impiety will have the heavier load of misery: external privileges and sacredness of character aggravate the wickedness, and will increase the punishment, of transgressors: and the ruin of churches and nations is often chargeable on the crimes of the leading ministers of religion. But let us, with serious application to ourselves, observe, how certainly the word of God takes effect; and how fatal are the consequences of obstinate iniquity and impiety. Let us consider the manifold changes of this world: that we may mourn even under long continued afflictions without desponding, as we know not what good may be reserved for us; and rejoice in prosperity without presuming, for we know not what fatal reverse may await us. And let us set our affections on things above, where there are no changes, or death, because no more temptation or sin, for evermore.

LAMENTATIONS OF JEREMIAH.

'The Jews denominate this Book Echah, (How,) from the first word of the text; or sometimes they call it 'Kinnoth, (Tears,) alluding to the mournful character of the work. Josephus and other writers, sup- 'pose that it was written upon the occasion of Josiah's death. The generality of commentators are, how- 'ever, of a contrary opinion: and indeed Jeremiah here bewails the desolations of Jerusalem, the captivity 'of Judah, the miseries of famine, and the cessation of all public worship, in terms so forcible and pathe- 'tic that they appear rather applicable to some period after the destruction of Jerusalem, when, agree- 'ably to his own predictions, every circumstance of complicated distress overshadowed Judea.' (Grey's Key.) *It is indeed wonderful, that any man, having attentively perused the book, should doubt concern-ing the occasion on which it was written. The prophet had said, that if the people "would not hear, his "soul should weep in secret places for their pride:" and, though the awful catastrophe was a remarkable attestation of his character as a true prophet, and confuted all his opposers; yet his lamentations over it constitute, beyond all comparison, the most tender and pathetic elegy, extant in any language. 'This 'poem affords the most elegant variety of affecting images that ever probably were collected into so small 'a compass. The scenes of affliction, the circumstances of distress, are pointed out with such beautiful 'combination, that we contemplate every where the most affecting picture of desolation and misery. 'The prophet reiterates his complaints in the most pathetic style; and aggravates his sorrow with a 'boldness and force of description, that correspond with the magnitude and religious importance of the 'calamities displayed to view. In the instructive strains of an inspired writer, he reminds his country- 'men of the grievous rebellions that had provoked the Lord to "abhor his sanctuary:" confesses that "it "was of God's mercies, that they were not utterly consumed;" and points out the sources of evil in the 'iniquities of their false prophets and priests. He then with indignant irony threatens Edom with de- 'struction for rejoicing over the miseries of Judea; opens a consolatory prospect to Zion; and con- 'cludes with an affecting address to God, to consider the reproach of his people, and to renew their pros- 'perity.' (Grey's Key,)—The leading design indeed of this sacred Poem seems to have been, to teach the captive Jews the due medium, betwixt obdurate insensibility and rebellious despondency, under their calamities; to lead them to consider God as the righteous Author, and sin as the deserving cause, of them: to call them to the exercise of submission, repentance, faith, and prayer; to show them the way of finding support under such complicated miseries, and with hopes of promised deliverance, from the mercy of God. This view of the subject will likewise occasionally lead us to look to him, who for our salvation became a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief, and who, in this and every other duty, hath left us a perfect example that we should follow his steps. (Note, iii. 1.) The nature of the subjects precludes the expectation of direct prophecies, as proofs of the divine inspiration of the poem; except as it introduces and adopts the predictions of other scriptures, and anticipates the accomplishment of them. Neither is it expressly quoted in the New Testament; unless St. Paul intended to refer to it, (Compare iii. 45. with 1 Cor. iv. 13:) but there never was a doubt so much as hinted by the Jews, against its being the genuine work of Jeremiah, and a part of the sacred oracles: and the instructions conveyed in it remarkably coincide with those of the New Testament. Each of the chapters consists of twenty two stanzas; (for no doubt the work is poetical:) Each verse in the first two begins with a letter of the Hebrew alphabet, in regular order; after the manner of some of the Psalms. The third has three short verses to each stanza; each beginning with the Hebrew letters as before; but with one variation as to the order of them. The fourth accords to the first and second: but the fifth, though consisting of the same number of verses, is not arranged according to the initial letters. There are many traditions extant about the death of this prophet; but no great dependence can be placed on them.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. 'The fifty second chapter of 'Jeremiah was formerly placed as a prologue to this book: '—but instead of it, the Greek and Latin copies have a 'short introduction,—which may be thus translated: "It "came to pass, that after Israel was carried captive, and Je-"rusalem desolate; the prophet Jeremiah sat weeping, and "bewailed Jerusalem with this lamentation, and said, &c. "&c." 'This argument was occasioned, as Huetius pro-'bably conjectures, by removing the fifty second chapter 'from the place where it first stood, and placing it at the 'conclusion of the prophecy of Jeremiah.' (Lowth.) In these pathetic complaints, the prophet sometimes speaks in his own person; at other times Jerusalem or Zion, as a sorrowing female, is the speaker; and at others a chorus, or collective body of the Jews, is introduced. The reader is also in some places made to witness the miseries of the people during the siege of Jerusalem; then the calamities attending the plunder and destruction of it are presented to his imagination; then he reviews the dreary condition of the city and land, when the desolations were completed, and hears the insults of their enemies over them; or his attention is called to the poor captives at Babylon, as if indeed a spectator of the hardships put on them. Thus the scenes are shifted, so to speak, in such a manner as may best realize to the mind the various and complicated miseries endured by the nation, from the death of Josiah to the completion of the captivity; but especially at the close of that period. The scene here laid is the city, after all the inhabitants were driven out of it, and its buildings were burned, and while it lay in ruins. The prophet had witnessed Jerusalem a populous, prosperous, and tumultuous city: but now viewing her desolate situation, he exclaims, "How doth the city sit solitary, that was full of "people!" Jerusalem, as a weeping female, sits on the ground, with none to attend or comfort her: the Lord had forsaken her, her king was carried captive, and she was become as a widow. She had been eminent in dignity and authority; and in the days of David and Solomon, several of the surrounding nations acknowledged her as their princess, and rendered her tribute: but she was now become tributary, and was grievously oppressed by the heathen. How had this lamentable reverse in her condition taken place? Without doubt the hand of God was gone forth against her: or her enemies could never have thus prevailed. On these accounts Jerusalem is represented as weeping very sore in the night when others are refreshed by sleep; a continued flow of tears bedewed her cheeks; none of her idols, who had seduced her from God, and had been her paramours in spiritual adultery, could now afford her any consolation; and her heathen allies, whom she had relied on as friends, were treacherously turned to be her enemies. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. Here the scene changes, and the nation is considered as another female dragged away to Babylon, a captive and a slave; by reason of those grievous afflictions which sin had occasioned. There she dwelt "in great "servitude," among idolaters, at a distance from God's ordinances, bereft of all her comforts, and exposed to every outrage from the insulting victors, who hated her for her relation to JEHOVAH; nor could she there have any rest from labour, terror, and suffering. Her persecutors, who had long pursued her, at length had overtaken her in the straits, where she could not elude or avoid them: and she was entirely exposed to their merciless oppression. (Jer. iii. 6—11.)

8 Jerusalem [d] hath grievously sinned; therefore she is * removed: [e] all that honoured her despise her, because [f] they have seen her nakedness: yea, [g] she sigheth, and turneth backward.

9 Her [h] filthiness is in her skirts; [i] she remembereth not her last end; therefore she [k] came down wonderfully: [l] she had no comforter. O LORD, [m] behold my affliction: [n] for the enemy hath magnified himself.

10 The adversary hath [o] spread out his hand upon all her † pleasant things: for she hath [p] seen that the heathen entered into her sanctuary, [q] whom thou didst command that they should not enter into thy congregation.

11 All her people sigh; [r] they seek bread; they have given their pleasant things for meat to ‡ relieve the soul: [s] see, O LORD, and consider; for I am become vile.

12 ◊ Is it nothing to you, all ye that ‖ pass by? behold, and see, [t] if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow, which is done unto me, wherewith the LORD hath afflicted me, in the day of his fierce anger.

V. 4—7. The poor disconsolate captive is for the present lost sight of; and the reader is presented with a view of the city after it was taken. The ways that led to Zion, had used at stated times to be thronged by persons, who from all parts of the land came up to keep the solemn feasts; but now the enemies were in possession of the city, the inhabitants were slain or carried captive, and the ways were unfrequented! The gates, through which numbers had used to pass and repass continually, were silent and desolate. The priests, deprived of employment and subsistence, spent their time in unavailing sighs: and the virgins, who formerly attended the sacred temple-service, were in the deepest distress. Zion herself or Jerusalem (1.) was in bitterness: her enemies had acquired the ascendency, and prospered in all their attempts against her: the Lord, who had been her Protector, was provoked by the multitude of her transgressions to give her up into the hands of her adversaries; and her children were torn from her and carried captive. Thus all her beauty and glory, both of external prosperity and of the temple and sacred services, were departed from her. (Marg. Ref.) Her princes, once courageous as lions, were now become, not only as timorous as the hunted harts or deer which dare not face the pursuers, but as feeble as the harts that find no pasture and are not able to flee away. In these circumstances Jerusalem remembered, with bitter regret, her former prosperity and privileges, both civil and sacred; and this remembrance added to her anguish, now that her people were helplessly fallen into the hand of the enemy. Her adversaries saw and insulted over her miseries: and as they had always derided her sacred solemnities, and observance of her sabbaths; they now mocked her, because those peculiarities had been apparently of no use to her.

V. 8—11. The enemies of Jerusalem, witnessing her calamities, mocked at her religion as unprofitable: but the prophet reminded them, that her miseries were the punishment of her grievous transgressions, which rendered all her forms of godliness unacceptable. She was therefore removed, and as it were turned out of doors, for her offences. The nations, that had been used to honour her, now despised her; for her crimes by which she had disgraced herself, were as conspicuous as the punishments were, by which God had stripped her naked and exposed her to shame: and this was the cause of her sighs, groans, and confusion of face. Indeed she had been so shameless in her filthiness, that she had taken no pains to conceal it, but exposed it to every one: nor had she remembered what Moses and the prophets declared would be the last end of such misconduct; therefore she was brought down from her eminency in the most wonderful manner, and was reduced to the most abject and disconsolate misery. In this view of the state of Jerusalem, the prophet was extremely grieved to think, how the enemy magnified himself, and was emboldened in idolatry and blasphemy: and he therefore besought the Lord to behold and compassionate his affliction. He was deeply affected to see the adversaries of Jerusalem, not only seize on all her valuable treasures, jewels, and furniture; but spread their sacrilegious hands on the sacred vessels of the temple, which were most pleasant to every pious mind: for Jerusalem had seen the heathen, who by the law were excluded from the congregation of Israel, profaning by their presence and depredations, the sanctuary and even the holy of holies! At the same time the people sighed and lamented; for in the extremity of the famine, they not only had given all their valuable effects to purchase bread, to preserve their lives; but at length were forced by hunger to give up the temple and all its pleasant things, into the hands of the idolatrous besiegers. In this sad condition Jerusalem at length brake silence, and supplicated the compassion of God, seeing she was become so vile and despised among the enemies of true religion.

15 The LORD hath [c] trodden under foot all my mighty men in the midst of me: he hath called an assembly against me to [d] crush my young men: the LORD hath trodden * the virgin, the daughter of Judah, [e] as in a wine-press.

16 For these things [f] I weep; mine eye, mine eye runneth down with water, because the comforter that should † relieve my soul is far from me: [g] my children are desolate, because the enemy prevailed.

17 Zion [h] spreadeth forth her hands, and there is [i] none to comfort her: the LORD hath [k] commanded concerning Jacob, that his adversaries should be round about him: [l] Jerusalem is as a menstruous woman among them.

18 The [m] LORD is righteous; [n] for I have rebelled against his † commandment: [o] hear, I pray you, all people, and behold my sorrow: [p] my virgins and my young men are gone into captivity.

19 I called [q] for my lovers, but they deceived me: [r] my priests and mine elders gave up the ghost in the city, while they sought their meat to relieve their souls.

20 [s] Behold, O LORD: for I am in distress: [t] my bowels are troubled; mine heart is turned within me; [u] for I have grievously rebelled; [x] abroad the sword bereaveth, at home there is as death.

21 They [y] have heard that I sigh: there is none to comfort me: all mine enemies have heard of my trouble; [z] they are glad that thou hast done it: [a] thou wilt bring [b] the day that thou hast ‡ called, and [c] they shall be like unto me.

V. 12—17. Jerusalem or Zion is here introduced, (as in the close of the last verse:) sitting dejected and distressed upon the ground; and, seeing the passengers disposed to neglect or insult her sufferings, she called upon them to consider whether her example did not concern them? Doubtless they ought to consider the greatness of her miseries, that they might sympathize with her; and the cause of them, that they might take warning and receive instruction. It must be evident that her sorrows were unprecedented in greatness and variety: and that the Lord himself had done all this to her in his fierce anger. His wrath, like fire from heaven, penetrated, tortured, and consumed her bones, and enervated all her strength. His various judgments, (like a net spread for her feet,) so entangled her that she could not escape; and if she attempted it, he still turned her back again into the power of her persecutors. Thus he had made her destitute and faint with unremitted miseries. She had been sold as a slave for her transgressions; and God himself had bound the yoke, and wreathed it on her neck, so that she could not possibly shake it off: her slavery was the evident effect of her crimes, and was embittered by the sense of his wrath: and he had deprived her of all power to withstand, or escape, the instruments of his righteous vengeance. He had trodden down all the mighty men, who attempted to defend her: he had collected the armies against her, who crushed her young men to pieces: he had given her up into the hands of the besiegers, to be bruised by them, as grapes are when cast into the wine-press. These things extorted her ceaseless tears: for God, who alone could comfort her when thus bereaved of her children, was become her enemy, and paid no regard to her supplications, when she spread forth her hands towards him. Nay, he had given commandment, that her adversaries should surround her, and that even idolaters should treat her with loathing or neglect.—Some parts of this passage, are often quoted, in speaking of our Lord's sufferings; and they are capable of a striking accommodation: but it should be recollected, that this is only an accommodation, and not the real meaning of the sacred writer. The address is so beautifully pathetical, that no comment can do justice to it.

V. 18—22. In the midst of all her sufferings, Jerusalem was constrained to acknowledge the justice of God, and to condemn herself; for she had rebelled against his commandment. It was therefore worthy of the attention of all people to observe the punishment to which her crimes had subjected her. All confidences failed in the extremity of her trouble: even her priests and elders perished for famine: what then must have been the case with the multitude of her inhabitants? But her inward anguish was most intolerable, through the sense of guilt and of the wrath of God; whilst the sword devoured without, and the famine within the city; (for the scene seems here to be laid previous to the taking of Jerusalem.) It was in vain to look to her former friends, for they had heard of her sorrows, but attempted not to comfort her. And her enemies exulted and rejoiced over her miseries, out of hatred to her religion. She had therefore none to look to but God, and to him she made her appeal; assured that the doom of her enemies was passed, and that the Lord would deal with them as he had done with her because of her transgressions, which had reduced her to so deplorable a condition. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

We shall often be required in this evil world to weep with

CHAP. II.

The prophet describes and mourns over the desolations of Jerusalem and the miseries of the Jews, as brought on them by the just indignation of God, 1—12. He laments over the unequalled sufferings of the people who, by hearkening to false prophets, are exposed to the cruel insults of their enemies; and he calls on the sufferers to join with him in tears and prayers, 13—19. Zion refers her doleful case to the compassionate consideration of God, 20—22.

those that weep, and we should not be reluctant to so salutary an employment. As we now hear the denunciations of the wrath of God against the workers of iniquity; so we shall soon be spectators of their accomplishment; nay, here the serious mind perceives abundant cause to meditate, with solemn awe and deep concern, on the tokens of his indignation at the sins of men. The history of nations, churches, families, and individuals, abounds with fulfilments of the Scriptures. How is it that so many populous cities now sit solitary? That so many flourishing empires are now become tributary and enslaved? Whence are the tears with which vast multitudes wear away their restless nights and joyless days; whilst they mourn the loss of dear relatives, the treachery of professed friends, the cruelty of enemies, the oppression of the powerful, the fury of persecutors, grievous servitude, and multiplied afflictions? Whence is it, that idolaters now occupy the places where flourishing churches once were? That the ways of Zion are deserted, her ordinances interrupted or profaned; her gates desolated; her priests and people in bitterness, or cut off? How is it that the adversaries of the Church are the chief and prosper, and that her children are in captivity? However we may vary our inquiries, the same answer recurs: the fierce anger of the Lord for man's transgressions hath filled the earth with sighs and groans, with tears, sickness, and death. Sin hath slain all the former generations of men; hath murdered our ancestors, relatives, friends, or children; hath aimed many a mortal blow at us, and will certainly effect our death also. Sin hath prepared the place of torment, and filled it with fallen spirits, and with the souls of those who have died unpardoned and unchanged. Sin would as certainly have conveyed all our souls to this place of misery, as all our bodies to the grave; if the Lamb of God had not come to take away the guilt and power of it, from those who believe in him. Sin hath tarnished all the beauty and marred all the glory of our rational nature. Sin fills our consciences with remorse and our hearts with terror; deprives the soul of strength and confidence; perverts every pleasant thing and every good gift of God, and even his truths, sabbaths, and ordinances, into occasions of deeper condemnation and misery. Yet after all, we are disposed to lodge this serpent in our bosom, yea, to entertain it in our hearts, to expect our happiness from it, and to cleave to it as our most valuable treasure! Among the manifold evil effects of sin, the pious mind is peculiarly grieved, when, being committed by professors of true religion, it causes the enemies of God to blaspheme, and to mock and scoff at the truths and ordinances of his word and worship. Wo be to the world because of such offences: and wo be to those by whom such offences come; except their repentance be as deep as their transgressions are aggravated. We ought to prefer any of the other temporal effects of sin to this. Should any be wonderfully brought down from the height of affluence to the depth of penury; should their honour be changed for contempt; should they have no comforter in affliction, and be constrained to part with all their pleasant things for bread to sustain life; nay, should they have the prospect of dying by famine: yet all this ought to be considered as far less afflicting than that their sins should cause the name, truths, and ordinances of God to be blasphemed; and men to stumble and fall and perish for ever, through the increasing prejudice, hardness, and impiety that they have excited. Even the profanation of sacred things, and the sacrilege of those who in different ages have laid their rapacious hands on the substance which was dedicated to the support of religion; and the contempt with which the clerical office hath been treated by profligates and infidels, have in great measure been chargeable upon the atrocious sins of professors and preachers of the Gospel, who have rendered themselves vile, and exposed themselves to shame by their evident misconduct; and therefore the Lord hath made them vile and contemptible even to the most abandoned of mankind.

We cannot derive benefit from our sufferings, unless we look above the instruments and occasions of them, and consider the hand of God in them. He it is, who impoverishes, enfeebles, intimidates, and enslaves men, as he sees good: he treads down and crushes the mighty, the valiant, and the delicate, without respect of rank, of age, or sex. Wars, pestilences, and famines, are his judgments: conquerors, tyrants, and oppressors are his executioners; and he is just in all the miseries which spring from their injustice. We should therefore look to him in all our troubles, and inquire, Wherefore he contendeth with us? we should consider our ways and confess our sins, and mingle our tears of natural grief for our sufferings, with those of godly sorrow for our sins. We should entreat the Lord to consider, and relieve our miseries, and to pardon our transgressions: we should despair of comfort and help from all others, and confidently expect them from his mercy, truth, and power: we should justify him in our sufferings, and condemn ourselves; acknowledging that we have rebelled against his commandment, and that grievously. Thus we should pour out our hearts before him, who regards the sighs and counts the tears of such as mourn for their sins: then will he support us under every stroke of his correcting rod; in due time vouchsafe us deliverance, and render the whole profitable to our souls; he will restore our privileges and comforts, and confound all our enemies. —They who rejoice over the calamities of the Lord's people, should remember, that their day also is coming, when, except they repent of this their wickedness, they will be rendered still more contemptible and miserable. It may therefore properly be inquired of all that pass by, whether the sufferings of the people of God be nothing to them? If they have no thought of compassionating, or attempting to alleviate their distresses, they may at least behold and be instructed: they may see in them the holiness of God, the evil of sin, the emptiness of forms, the fatal effects of hypocrisy and impiety: and they may take warning to flee from the wrath to come, by considering the temporal miseries to which sin exposes men in this world; "For if the righteous scarcely are saved, where will the "ungodly and profligate appear?" If the rod of correction be so terrible, what will the sword of vengeance be? But whatever may be learned by viewing the desolations of Jerusalem, either by the Chaldeans or Romans; far more may be learned from looking unto Jesus, and his sufferings and death. Does he not, as it were from the cross, call on every heedless mortal to attend to the interesting scene? Does he not say, "Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? "Behold, and see if there be any sorrow like unto my "sorrow, wherewith the LORD hath afflicted me, in the "day of his fierce anger," 'against the sins of those 'whom I came to seek and save? Is it nothing to you, 'that I am here a sinless sufferer? That I, the well be-'loved Son of the Father, am consumed by the fire of his 'wrath, and that my heart in the midst of my bowels is 'even as melting wax, and all my bones out of joint, and 'that mine enemies stand staring on, and insulting over 'me? Is it nothing to you, that the Father hath wreathed 'on my neck the yoke of man's transgressions, and laid 'on me the iniquity of all his people?' I say, doth not our suffering Immanuel seem thus to address us? And does it not behoove us to consider who this Sufferer was, what he suffered, and why he suffered at all? Here we may see the evil of sin, the honour of the law, and the justice of God, more than in all the other scenes that we have been contemplating: here we may learn the worth of our souls, the importance of eternal things, the vanity of the world, and the misery of fallen man. Here we may see the only Foundation of our hope, and the Source of our comfort and happiness. Here we may learn gratitude and patience, meekness and mercy, from the brightest example, and the most endearing motives. Let then all our sorrows lead us to contemplate the cross of Christ, and to mark the way he took, through sufferings and death, to his glory: that we may be comforted under our trials, and cheerfully follow our Fore-runner, that where he is, there we may be also.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1. The prophet had before spoken, as full of astonishment, at the deplorable condition to which Jerusalem was fallen; (i. 1:) but here he inquires, with mingled surprise and regret, how the Lord, the Author of her afflictions, could be induced thus to distress her? Zion had been exalted to heaven in privileges, and in the honour put on her by the temple and ordinances of God. These, with the ark of the covenant, were the beauty of Israel and the footstool of JEHOVAH's throne: but now she was covered with a dark cloud from his indignation; the city and temple were cast down to the ground; nor did he so remember the temple, or even the ark, as to preserve it in the day of his fierce anger. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2. Polluted, &c. The whole kingdom of Judah had a relative sanctity: but the Lord polluted it, by casting it out of his protection, leaving it in the power of the heathen, and destroying it, notwithstanding the covenant of royalty made with David and his seed. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. 'By the horn of Israel is meant his strength 'and glory, especially his kingly dignity.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

Drawn, &c. The Lord had been wont to stretch forth his right hand, to fight against the enemies of Zion; but he had now drawn it back, and left them to prosper in their attempts: nay, his wrath burned against his people, like a consuming fire, in every place whither they fled for refuge.

V. 4. Slew, &c. 'Those who were in the flower of 'their age, the joy and delight of their parents.' (Lowth.)

V. 5. Swallowed, 'As a lion devoureth his prey. 'The verb signifies in a general sense to destroy.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6. The temple was, with great violence, as completely destroyed by the Chaldeans, as a tent is removed: and the Lord no more regarded it, than a man does a temporary hut, erected in a garden, and pulled down when it is done with. (Marg. Ref.) The kings of David's favoured race, and the priests of Aaron's consecrated seed, were alike despised by him in his indignation at their sins.

V. 7. 'As the people were accustomed to praise God 'in the solemn feasts with a loud voice; so now the enemy 'blaspheme him with shoutings and cries.'

V. 8. A line, &c. (Marg. Ref.)

Lament. 'This is a figurative speech, as that was, 'when he said, "The ways of Zion lament," (i. 4.) 'meaning that this sorrow was so great, that the insensi-'ble things seemed to have their part in it.'

V. 9. The gates of Jerusalem, or of the temple, were laid on the earth, and covered with ruins, as if they had sunk into the ground. The law was no more: for its ordinances could no more be observed; the temple and altar being destroyed, and the ordinances of worship suspended, as if no more to be attended on. Jeremiah himself seems to have survived the desolations of Jerusalem for a considerable time: yet it does not appear, that he delivered any encouraging prophecies to the Jews after that event; and the most of Ezekiel's predictions relating to Israel, (except the obscure vision of the temple, &c. in the last chapters of his prophecy,) were delivered about the time when Jerusalem was destroyed and Judea desolated.—Daniel delivered no prophecy immediately relating to the temporal state of his people, till the seventy years of the captivity were nearly expired. So that there seems to have been, at this period, a very peculiar suspension of that information and encouragement, which the prophets had, for many ages, been employed to communicate to the people. Except Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel, no prophet is mentioned, from the beginning to the end of the captivity, when Haggai and Zachariah were raised up.—This chasm was an evident token of divine displeasure, and must have been a very sensible aggravation of the sufferings endured by the pious remnant.

V. 10. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11. The prophet had wept over the calamities of his people, till he had no more power to weep, and his eyes failed to supply tears, or were almost blinded. (Marg. Ref.) His sorrow occasioned the most painful internal commotion, which greatly affected and disordered his vitals. Violent grief, or other vehement affections, are known to cause excessive bilious disorders, and great evacuations from the gall, which is placed on the liver, and to which the prophet is supposed to refer. He was peculiarly affected by beholding the young children, and even the sucking infants, fainting and dying for hunger and thirst in the streets of the city, whilst none had it in their power to relieve them. The scene is here laid just before the taking of the city.

V. 12. The case of the poor children was as desperate as that of the men, who lay weltering in their blood and expiring of their wounds: for, even whilst they were in the arms of their mothers, and supplicated them for ourishment, they expired for want, dying in a lingering and most deplorable manner.

V. 13. The prophet wanted to comfort his people by some suitable topic; but he could not have recourse to those which were commonly employed on such occasions. For who could be found to testify, that he had seen a city visited with as complicated and dire miseries as Jerusalem

14 Thy [a] prophets have seen vain and foolish things for thee: and [b] they have not discovered thine iniquity, to turn away thy captivity; but have seen for thee [c] false burdens and causes of banishment.

15 All [d] that pass * by [e] clap their hands at thee; [f] they hiss and [g] wag their head at the daughter of Jerusalem, saying, [h] Is this the city that men call The perfection of beauty, The joy of the whole earth?

16 All [i] thine enemies have opened their mouth against thee: they hiss and [k] gnash the teeth: they say, [l] We have swallowed her up: certainly this is the day that we looked for; we have found, [m] we have seen it.

17 The LORD hath [n] done that which he had devised; he hath fulfilled his word that he had commanded in the days of old: [o] he hath thrown down, and hath not pitied; and [p] he hath caused thine enemy to rejoice over thee, he hath set up the horn of thine adversaries.

18 Their [q] heart cried unto the LORD, [r] O wall of the daughter of Zion, [s] let tears run down like a river day and night: give thyself no rest; let not the apple of thine eye cease.

19 Arise, cry out in the night: in the beginning of the [u] watches [x] pour out thine heart like water before the face of the LORD: [y] lift up thy hands toward him for the life of thy young children, [z] that faint for hunger in the top of every street.

20 Behold, O LORD, and [a] consider to whom thou hast done this. [b] Shall the women eat their fruit, and children † of a span long? [c] shall the priest and the prophet be slain in the sanctuary of the LORD?

21 The [d] young and the old lie on the ground in the streets: [e] my virgins and my young men are fallen by the sword; thou hast slain them in the day of thine anger; [f] thou hast killed, and not pitied.

22 Thou hast called as in a solemn day [g] my terrors round about, so that in the day of the LORD's anger none escaped nor remained: [h] those, that I have swaddled and brought up, hath mine enemy consumed.

had been? What misery could he compare and equal with her's, in order to comfort her? Indeed the breach made on her, (like those made by the irruptions of the sea,) was vast, and irreparable by any human power.

V. 14. The false prophets flattered the people with assurances of peace, and thus encouraged them in their sins; and their false visions were the causes of their banishment or captivity; whereas, had they charged their crimes upon their consciences, and called them to repentance, the captivity might have been prevented. The word burdens, though it generally signifies prophecies of heavy judgments, here means predictions in general: for the false prophets "spake peace when there was no peace."

V. 15, 16. The idolaters took the words out of the mouth of the Jews, and derided them for glorying in their holy city, and its peculiar protection and privileges. (Marg. Ref.) The combination of scorn, enmity, rage, and exultation, which the conquerors and spectators manifested, when gratified by the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, are set before the reader with peculiar pathos and energy. The whole scene is presented to his view, as in some exquisitely finished historical painting: and the insulting multitudes, who surrounded the Redeemer's cross, can hardly be forgotten on the occasion.

V. 17. 'He hath fulfilled those threatenings, which 'he denounced against us, in the law of Moses.' (Lowth.) —This reference to the ancient predictions against Israel, for their sins, is of great importance; both as it shows that these prophecies were then extant and well known among the Jews, and that they were understood by the pious remnant exactly as we now explain them. (Notes, Lev. xxi. Deut. xxviii—xxxii.)

V. 18, 19. In the depth of their calamities the people cried unto the Lord, out of the anguish and distress of their hearts: and called on others to lament over the wall of the daughter of Zion, which was about to be levelled with the ground, to complete the desolations. And the prophet permitted them to give vent to their sorrows, and to weep without intermission: but he also excited them to join their nocturnal lamentations with fervent prayers, pouring out their hearts before God, and lifting up their hands towards him; beginning when the night-watches used to be set, employing the hours in ceaseless prayers and tears, which others spent in sleep; and pleading for the life of the young children, that they might not all perish with hunger, and the rising generation of Israel be thus entirely cut off. 'As the wall and rampart are said to la-'ment, (8,) because their ruins are objects of lamentation; 'so here devout persons direct their prayers to God, as if 'the ruins themselves did entreat him to take compassion 'on the miseries of that place, which he had chosen for 'his peculiar residence.'—'Offer up thy earnest prayers 'with tears to the throne of grace; and send up thy very 'soul, and thy devoutest affections with them.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 20—22. Jerusalem is here introduced as speaking

CHAP. III.

The prophet bitterly bewails his complicated sufferings, 1—20. He acknowledges the mercy and truth of God, and the benefit of afflictions to be a proper ground of patient hope, 21—36. He exhorts his people to submit to the sovereignty of God, and humbly to turn unto him, 37—41. He mingles complaints with confessions of sin, 42—54. He appeals to God against his enemies, and beseeches him to execute judgment upon them, 55—66.

She entreated the Lord to consider, that he thus afflicted the only people who worshipped him, and were called by his name. Could he then be unconcerned, whilst the women of Zion ate their own infants, as soon as they were born? This intimation thus given fills the mind with the utmost horror, and implies the greatest possible extreme of earthly misery, inducing desperation and barbarity; and our thoughts recoil from it, as too shocking to be dwelt upon. (Marg. Ref.) Hophni and Phinehas the priests were slain by the sword in the field of battle: but when Jerusalem was taken, the priests and prophets were slain in the sanctuary, and their blood mingled with that of their sacrifices: and to complete their other calamities, the enemies of their nation, at the call of Providence, flocked from all around, to profane the sanctuary, and terrify the worshippers; even as the people had been used to flock together to keep their solemn feasts.

Span, &c. 'The margin reads, "swaddled with their "hands," in which sense the word is used in the twenty-'second verse.' (Lowth.) All the affectionate care and assiduous attention of a mother seems to be meant; yet extreme hunger and desperation induced the most unnatural cruelty to the same endeared object!

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

The mercy of God is perpetual and immense "towards "them that fear him;" but no external relations, privileges, or profession, by which men may be exalted, as it were, to heaven, can avail those who have not the fear of God before their eyes: for they, who think to please the heart-searching God, by hypocritical services, are "a "people that have no understanding; and he that made "them will not have mercy on them." For this cause, the Lord "covered the daughter of Zion with a cloud in "his anger," "cast down from heaven to earth the beauty "of Israel," swallowed up his habitations, threw down his strong holds, cut off his horn of defence, burned against him as a consuming fire, and fought against him as an enemy. And if he regarded not his temple, the ark of his covenant, or the families of Aaron and David; if he cast off his altar and abhorred his sanctuary, and let the heathen profane his most holy place, when the Jews had defiled them by their sins; what hope can there be, that he will regard any forms, where the power of godliness is wanting? These institutions were of divine authority and of great significancy: whereas many of those things, in which men confide, are human inventions and traditions, unwarranted by the word of God, nay, contrary to it, yet are they persuaded that "the LORD will do them good, because "they have a Levite for their priest," an Ephod, a Teraphim, and a house of gods or carved idols! (Notes, Judg. xvii. 4—13.) But even those doctrines, ordinances, and regulations, which are most exactly scriptural, when scrupulously retained by men distitute of the Spirit of God, are but a lifeless carcass of religion: and when made a cloak for iniquity, God abhors them. So that, in the day of his wrath for national wickedness, he will despise temples and palaces, kings and priests, establishments and forms of every kind. While persons, under heavy afflictions, are allowed to vent their indignation on the injurious instruments of their anguish, conscience is soothed and pride flattered, and some transient and pernicious relief is obtained. It therefore becomes a necessary but painful operation, by repeated admonitions, to turn the thoughts of the afflicted to the hand of God lifted up against them, and to their sins as the source of their miseries; and to show that greater miseries impend, except repentance and forgiveness intervene. This should always be attempted by condoling friends and the ministers of God. Indeed, this requires a delicate and cautious hand: and they are most fit for the work, who actually share the sorrows of the distressed, and mingle compassionate tears with their warnings, instructions, and exhortations.

V. 13—22.

It is sometimes adviseable, to allow those who are in extreme affliction to consider their sorrows as very great; and even to expatiate on the circumstances that most oppress them; and then to give the subject a religious turn, and show that all our sorrows are deserved, and admit of redress; and that the sources of our consolation are far greater than our greatest griefs can be. Indeed, the topics that philosophy suggests on such occasions are very feeble and inadequate: it gives little support to the wounded and distressed heart, to hear that others have suffered the same, or even greater afflictions; that they are the common lot of man, and cannot be avoided; or that it is more becoming to bear up under them, than to complain and repine. But religion brings us more powerful supports, by leading us to consider the mercy of God, his readiness to pardon; his power to support and comfort; his wisdom, truth and love, and the blessed effects of sanctified afflictions. When mourners are brought to cry to the Lord, and pour out their hearts before him; they will not long hang down their heads unto the ground: for he can heal those breaches, which to all others are irreparable; and he will turn our earnest prayers, (though presented with sighs and tears,) into joyful praises. But whilst we contemplate the scenes here set before us, and view the children perishing by famine, slain by the sword, or even made the horrid repast of their frantic mothers, and the prophets and priests slain in the sanctuary of the Lord; whilst we view the enemies of Jerusalem clapping their hands, wagging their heads, gnashing their teeth, and saying, "Is this the city, "that men call the perfection of beauty, the joy of the "whole earth?" and rejoicing in having at length obtained their advantage against her, and swallowed her up: and whilst on the other hand we consider, that in all this God performed what he had devised and predicted many ages before; and remember for what and to whom he did this; let us learn to shun false teachers, who speak smooth things and prophesy deceits; who do not detect men's iniquities, but flatter them in their sins; and who thus bring ruin on churches and nations, and on the souls of multitudes. Let us fear being deceived; let us beware of hypocrisy, and of trusting in our privileges; let us watch and pray against temptation; and learn to fear God, and walk humbly before him; and "whilst we think we stand, take "heed lest we fall."

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1. The construction of this chapter differs from that of those which have been considered. It consists of the same number of stanzas, according to the number of the letters in the Hebrew alphabet: but every stanza is divided into three parts, or verses, each of which begins with the same Hebrew letter; the first three verses with Aleph, the three next with Beth, &c.; and in one instance the order of the letters varies from that which is elsewhere observed. It also forms a distinct elegy, or lamentation, arranged differently from those which precede. The prophet speaks throughout the whole, lamenting his afflictions, seeking out consolatory topics, and giving counsel and encouragement to his fellow mourners. Some indeed understand it to be the language of a chorus of Jews, speaking as one person: but so many passages evidently refer to Jeremiah's own personal trials, that this interpretation seems inadmissible. 'The subject of the chapter is 'penitential meditations upon the prophet's own calamities, 'as well as those of the public; together with pious 'reflections upon the end which God proposes in sending 'afflictions, and the good use which men ought to make of 'such chastisements.' (Lowth.) 'I am the man that 'has seen this great affliction, which the Lord hath in just 'anger brought upon his people.' (Bp. Hall.) Probably he spake in his own person, as one who, besides his peculiar afflictions, shared largely in those of his nation, and sympathized with them in those from which he was most exempted. He spake of himself as a public character, for the common benefit; being one of many, who thus shared and mourned over the calamities of Israel. We before met with some passages in the writings of Jeremiah, like the bitter complaints of Job; (Marg. Ref.) and we here find various expressions similar to those used by that afflicted and tempted servant of God: and this favours the supposition, that he related the more gloomy and discouraging part of his own experience, and the way in which he found support and relief, as the best method of instructing and comforting his fellow sufferers. In this view of the chapter, we consider the prophet addressing the afflicted Jews, in order to counsel and encourage them; and speaking as one who knew the heart of a mourner, and could sympathize with them. He was the man who had been peculiarly conversant with affliction, having experienced the effects of God's anger, both for his own sins, and as sharing the punishment inflicted on his people. (Notes, Heb. ii. 17. iv. 15, 16.) 'It is worthy to be 'observed, that Jeremiah, in endeavouring to promote re-'signation in his countrymen, represents his own deport-'ment under afflictions, in terms which have a prophetic 'cast; so strikingly are they descriptive of the patience 'and conduct of our Saviour under his sufferings. The 'prophet indeed, in the meek endurance of unmerited 'persecution, was an illustrious type of Christ.' (Grey's Key.) (Ps. xxii. xxxviii. lxix. lxxxviii. Marg. Ref.)

V. 2—9. The Lord had not sent his word to the Jews by a man accustomed to ease and indulgence; but by one whom he had led into great darkness and distress, both in his outward circumstances and his inward experience. He had scarcely known prosperity or comfort all his days, but had always been acquainted with grief and sorrow. The Lord had so crossed him in every thing, that he surely thought, (in the hour of temptation,) that he was turned to be his enemy, and continually employed his power to afflict and punish him. By a succession of sorrows his body was emaciated, and he was put to great pain and anguish, as if his bones were broken. God had builded against him, (as the Chaldeans had done against the city,) to exclude all relief from being brought to him, and to prevent his escape. Thus he reduced him to extremities, and surrounded him with the most distressing troubles; which caused him to sink into such despondency, that he was like one cast into a dark dungeon or sepulchre, confined among the remains of the dead, and secluded from the comforts of the living. The entrance of this dismal cave was so barricadoed, that he could not get out; he was loaded with a heavy and galling chain to increase his misery: and when in this situation he cried to God for help, he shut out his prayer, and would neither hear him for his own deliverance, nor for that of his people. Thus his path was closed up as by stone-walls, and he was lost in a labyrinth, from which he could not extricate himself. All this seems to refer to the case of the prophet, when in the dungeon and the stocks; and to his inward experience during those trials: but the language is extremely figurative; and might also be intended to represent the state of the Jewish Church, during the most afflictive period. (Marg. Ref.)

Shutteth, &c. 'It is a great temptation to the godly, 'when they see not the fruit of their prayers, and causeth 'them to think that they are not heard; which thing God 'useth to do, that they might pray more earnestly, and the 'oftener.'

V. 10—13. The prophet seems to have enlarged on his discouragements, preparatory to the account he intended to give of his supports and comforts. In the season of his trouble and temptation, the Lord became terrible to him, as a bear or a lion, that suddenly rushes from its covert upon the traveller, turns him out of his way, or tears him in pieces: for he had made him desolate, destroyed all his comforts, set him as a mark for his arrows, and wounded him by them in his vitals. In speaking of his own sufferings, he also referred to those of the Jews, in which he was so deeply interested: and some expressions may best suit his case, and others that of the people. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 14—16. In the midst of his other troubles, the prophet was derided and insulted by the people, over whose approaching calamities he so pathetically mourned; and they made him the subject of their profane songs, for which they were at length made a derision and a song to their enemies. Thus the Lord filled him with bitterness, and intoxicated him with the nauseous cup, of which he made him to drink, instead of the cordials that his case seemed to require: and instead of nourishing palatable food, his bread was, as it were, mixed with gravel, which brake his teeth, and put him to great pain when he attempted to eat; and he was covered with ashes, as a constant mourner and penitent.

V. 17—20. Here the prophet, addressing himself to God, complained that he had removed his soul to the greatest distance from peace, and had made him forget prosperity, through a long continuance of adversity. 'So Jo-'seph, speaking of the seven years of famine, saith, that "plenty shall be forgotten in the land of Egypt." (Lowth.) He was even brought to the borders of despair; as if he could have no help from the Lord, or hope in him, both being perished together. These thoughts harassed him, whilst he ruminated on his complicated and bitter troubles; and the more he revolved them in his mind, the greater depression of spirits he experienced; being bowed down not only in humiliation, but in deep dejection, as the word often means. 'Thus with pain he was driven to and fro 'between hope and despair, as the godly oft-times are, yet 'in the end the Spirit getteth the victory.'

V. 21—23. Some connect this with what goes before; and our version, (with the paragraph generally placed before the next verse,) and the termination of the distich in the original, favours this interpretation. 'Such was my 'wretched desponding state; yet I am delivered. I re-'member my despondency, and am humbled for it; and 'also my unexpected past deliverances, which encourages 'my hope for the future.' The generality, however, of commentators connect it with the following verses. 'The 'reflections, sat down in the following verses, are a suffi-'cient ground for our trusting in God under the severest 'trials.' (Lowth.) 'I recall to mind these following con-'siderations, and thereupon I conceive hope and comfort.' (Bp. Hall.) This connexion seems most obvious; according to which the prophet, having stated the extremity of his distress and temptation, proceeds to show how he was raised above them. (Notes, Ps. lxxiii. lxxviii.) He recollected, under his temptations, that, as a sinner, he might have been cut off and cast into the pit of destruction, and would certainly have thus perished, but for the mercies of God; while his people would have been totally consumed, and no remnant of them left. As, however, the Lord had mercifully spared him, and had not utterly destroyed them; as his compassions were plenteous and unfailing, and every morning renewed to him, in the continuance of his life and many unmerited benefits; and as God had given many precious promises to Israel, and to every believer, and in his great faithfulness had always performed them to those who trusted in him; so he found there was yet encouragement to hope, and to exercise patience and repentance, in expectation of returning comfort.

V. 24, 25. It next occurred to the prophet, that whatever he lost or suffered, or witnessed of the sufferings of his people, his grand interest was secure. He was satisfied that the Lord was his all-sufficient Portion. He was conscious, that he had chosen him as his Portion, and expected his happiness from him, and not from the world: and therefore he determined still to hope in him, and refer all his concerns to his wisdom, truth, and love. In this he evidently proposed himself as an example to his people, that they might seek comfort from God, when all other comfort failed. And though they might not be able confidently to aver, that the Lord was their Portion; yet they might remember, that he was kind and merciful to those who wait for him and seek him.

V. 26—30. The wisest, best, and most comfortable way that the afflicted people could take would be, to watch against murmurs and despondency; to hope in God for support and deliverance; to submit resignedly to his will, and wait his time; to use appointed and proper means, and no other; and thus in composure and confidence to wait for the performance of his promises of temporal and eternal salvation. This would be good in itself, honourable to God, and profitable to them. It would also be good and useful to bear the yoke in youth: if it were allowed beneficial to young persons to be inured to hardship, subjection, and discipline; it must be also good for men to be habituated early to affliction, and resignation to the Lord's will; to learn subjection to his authority, and to bear his yoke. Such afflictions and disappointments would tend to take their thoughts off from the world, and to check the eagerness of their pursuits and expectations; thus the sufferer would learn to court solitude and retirement, and to employ himself in serious reflection; because he would perceive that God had laid these burdens upon him; or he would be led to take them patiently as from him. And when he considered that the Lord afflicted men for their sins, and to bring them to repentance, he would put his mouth in the dust through self-abasement, confessing his sins, and welcoming the chastisement; if so be there might be hope of deliverance from the wrath to come. In this temper, the afflicted penitent would meekly yield to the injuries of men, as the correction of God; give his cheek to the smiter, and patiently endure the reproaches with which he should be loaded. This Christ did, though without sin; and the penitent sufferer will learn to imitate his example. The scope of the prophet was, to show the advantages, that might be derived from afflictions; and as this consideration tended to compose his own mind, he proposed it to his people, in order to reconcile them to their sufferings, and to teach them to profit by them.

V. 31—36. The sacred writer here suggested other consolatory topics. God had severely punished the nation of Israel, and cut off great numbers. But he never rejects the penitent, casts off the believer, or means to forsake his people: there was therefore still hope, both in their person and public concerns. For the honour of his justice, holiness, and truth, the Lord often caused grief; yet his manifold and infinite mercies disposed him to compassionate the sufferers; and to relieve them, when their sorrows had produced a salutary effect. Even in his ordinary dealings with the children of men, he did not willingly afflict them, from his heart, as taking pleasure in their sufferings, or without cause; but from a wise regard to his own glory, and the benefit of his universal kingdom. He was not like those oppressors, who delighted in crushing under their feet their prisoners or vassals; and who would thus enslave and trample down the whole earth, if they could. Much less would the Lord delight in afflicting his people, who submitted and humbled themselves before him. And as he used not his power to oppress or to do injustice, by prerogative, so he would never authorize it in others; he could not approve of those who in his presence deprived others of their right, or supplanted them in their cause: and therefore, as the Chaldeans had done the Jews great injustice, the latter might be sure, that God would in due time plead their cause against their oppressors.

37 ¶ Who is he that [g] saith, and it cometh to pass, when the LORD commandeth it not?

V. 37, 38. 'The king of Babylon, and such haughty 'tyrants, may boast of their power, as if it were equal to 'omnipotence: but still it is God's prerogative to bring to 'pass whatever he pleases. Nothing is brought to pass, 'but according to his determinate counsel and foreknow-'ledge:—as he makes men the instruments of his ven-'geance; so he can restrain their cruelty, when he sees fit. '—Calamities come from his will and disposal, as well as 'prosperity.' (Lowth.) When therefore the calamities of the Jews had produced the proper effect, the purposes of their oppressors would be frustrated, and they would no longer be able to enslave, or afflict them.

V. 39—41. As all sinners deserve death and destruction, and are exposed to be crushed every moment; so none, whose life is prolonged, who is out of hell and may hope for heaven, hath either right or reason to complain, whilst suffering the temporal punishment of his sins, which is far less than he deserves. The prophet therefore checked his own complaints, and those of his people, and called them to join with him in self-examination and a serious trial of all their ways, that they might discover and repent of all their sins, and return to the Lord, trusting in his mercy and worshipping his name. He reminded them also, not to rest in formally lifting up their hands to God, but to lift up their hearts also, considering the greatness and holiness of Him whose glory filled the heavens, though he condescended to notice their worship on earth.

V. 42—47. Some connect these verses with the preceding, by the word, saying;—"Let us lift up, &c." Saying, "We have transgressed, &c." The prophet, however, proceeded to direct the confessions of his people, and to put words into their mouths. He humbly acknowledged that they had transgressed and rebelled against God; and as he had not pardoned, it was plain they had not repented: this was the cause of all their miseries, of which he led them humbly and submissively to complain to the Lord. He had covered them with his anger, pursued them by his judgments, and destroyed them without pity: and he had so covered himself with a thick cloud, that their prayers could find no admission. The hypocritical prayers of the people for deliverance were rejected; and even the fervent prayers of the prophet in that behalf were discouraged. Thus the Lord made them as the offscouring and refuse of the nations, who insulted and trampled upon them; and opened their mouths in reproaches, menaces, boasts, and blasphemies, against them and their holy religion: and they were overwhelmed with terrors, entangled in snares, and given up to desolation and ruin.

Offscouring. 'St. Paul plainly alludes to this text, '1 Cor. iv. 13. The apostles, in quoting the Scriptures 'do not always follow the Septuagint, but now and then 'make a new translation from the Hebrew.' (Lowth.)—If the apostle referred to this text, as it is highly probable, this must have been the case; for there is nothing in the Septuagint like his words, which accord entirely with the Hebrew.

V. 48—51. The prophet here again spake in his own person, and of his share in the public calamities. He wept incessantly for the destruction of his people, and of Jerusalem; and must do so, till the Lord should look down from heaven, to regard and redress their calamities. Every object that he saw affected his heart, and renewed his sorrows: but especially when he saw the daughters of Jerusalem fallen into the hands of the brutal conquerors, and exposed to every kind of violence, without any protection. (Marg. Ref.)

55 I [o] called upon thy name, O LORD, out of the low dungeon.

56 Thou [p] hast heard my voice: [q] hide not thine ear at my breathing, at my cry.

57 Thou [r] drewest near in the day that I called upon thee: [s] thou saidst, Fear not.

V. 52—66. Jeremiah seems here more immediately to speak of his own trials; with reference to the case of his people, and the public calamities of the church. He had given no cause to his enemies to hate him: and yet they eagerly chased him as a bird, in order to destroy him. They thought they had cut him off, when they had let him down into the dungeon, and covered him over with a great stone, as if buried alive: and he seemed to himself as certainly cut off, as if the waters had flowed over his head. Yet out of this low dungeon he had called upon the Lord: he had pleaded with him that he had heretofore heard his voice; and entreated him that he would not now hide his ear from his sighs, and the breathings of his soul in prayer. God had been used to draw near to him when he prayed; to silence his fears, to plead his cause, and rescue his life; and to him he had appealed in that emergency. He had seen the wrong done to his servant, and knew the vengeance, the devices, and imaginations of his persecutors, with all their calumnies and reproaches; and that he was their constant derision and contempt. He had therefore besought the righteous Judge to plead his cause; which he thus unreservedly committed to him. The verbs in the concluding verses are all future, not imperative; a prophecy, and not an imprecation; what Jeremiah foresaw and foretold, without so much as a hint that he desired or prayed for it. "Thou wilt render them a recompense, &c. "Thou wilt give them a sorrow," or obstinacy, "of "heart, thy curse upon them. Thou wilt persecute and "destroy them," &c. Even the Septuagint renders the passage in this manner; and it is hard to say what has induced modern translators in general to give it the form of a most tremendous imprecation. The event had fully proved that the Lord had heard and answered Jeremiah's prayer from the dungeon: and this might well encourage the church, in her deep distress and misery, when she was as it were cast into the pit, overwhelmed, and ready to perish, amidst the insults and contempt of her enemies, to expect deliverance from the power and mercy of God, in answer to the prayers of her afflicted sons, and attended with the predicted vengeance on her persecutors. This seems to be the intention of the prophet. For if God had not disregarded the cries of one afflicted servant, could it be supposed that he would leave his whole church to sink for ever in her trouble, and not answer the prayers of all his people, and avenge them on their oppressors?

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—20.

They are best qualified to administer counsel and consolation to the afflicted, who have themselves experienced the smart and terror of the rod of divine wrath: and therefore ministers often pass through trials, that they may learn to speak seasonably to the afflicted; (2 Cor. i. 4—6.) It is very profitable, in speaking to the distressed and wounded in conscience, to show them what troubles and temptations we have been delivered out of; and in what way we have been led to peace and confidence in God. The suffering and tempted believer has very different views of the Lord's dealing with him, whilst in the midst of his conflicts, than at other times: the struggle betwixt unbelief and faith, flesh and spirit, is often very sore: and outward troubles concur with inward discouragement. Indeed the Lord sometimes leads his most eminent servants into darkness and not into light; and they are apt to conclude that he is punishing them as an enemy, and not correcting them as a Father; his hand seems turned against them all the day; the body is affected with the disquietude of the mind; God himself seems to exclude their souls from comfort, to put them to pain, to hedge up their way, to shut out their prayers and earnest cries, to plunge them into perplexity, to envelope them in darkness, and to appear in every way formidable to them. But whether our God frown or our enemies deride and insult; or whether our comforts be turned into gall and wormwood, or our souls forget prosperity, we may be assured that it is our infirmity and temptation, if we think that "our strength and hope are "perished from the Lord." Indeed, if we only consider our affliction and misery, or the power, justice, and holiness of God, compared with our guilt and pollution; and do not view him on a mercy-seat and ready to forgive; instead of being properly humbled before him, we shall sink into despondency. Thus conscious guilt may even swallow us up in over much sorrow, and give Satan an

CHAP. IV.

The prophet deplores the ruin of the city and temple; and the extreme misery of the people, especially by famine, 1—12. He ascribes these calamities to the sins of the prophets and priests; and shows how their allies disappointed, and their enemies pursued, them, 13—20. He predicts the termination of Zion's calamities, and judgments upon insulting Edom, 21, 22.

advantage against us; and it is of great importance to be aware of his devices. But if we properly recal to mind the Lord's goodness, we shall yet have hope in our darkest hours: and we should consider how others have found comfort in similar circumstances, that when we too have found relief, we may point it out to our brethren also.

V. 21—41.

The due consideration of the evil of sin and our own sinfulness, will convince us that "it is of the LORD's mercies "that we are not consumed." If they had not been more abundant even than our provocations, we should not now be in the land of hope, of pardon, of prayer. And how much worse might it have been with us than now it is! How many have been cut off, and perished in their sins! How many on earth are suffering more severe pains than we are! How many sufferers have no acquaintance with their guilt and danger! and what severe and long-continued self-denial hath God often required of his most honoured servants, which they found it their wisdom and duty, and eventually their happiness, to submit to, in humble patience! How much then is it our's to bear our lighter cross, and exercise that moderate self-denial to which he calls us! And how shameful if we repine, despond, or seek relief by sin! These and similar reflections will suggest reasons even for gratitude in our afflictions, and for hope in our dejections. He who hath hitherto spared us, and whose compassions are new to us every morning, yet waiteth to be gracious: great is his sincerity in his invitations, and faithfulness to his promises; and he hath promised to teach and help all who desire to come, as well as to receive all that do come to him. If we cannot then say, with unwavering voice, "The LORD is my Portion:" may we not say, 'I desire to have him for my Portion and 'Salvation, and in his word do I hope?' We may wait on and seek him, assured of success. Let us then watch against despondency, as well as presumption; and count it "good to hope and quietly to wait for the salvation of the "LORD." We should also remember, that many have found the galling yoke of affliction salutary and useful; and in the severe school of adversity have learned repentance, patience, and godliness. As that is always best for us which most tends to the salvation of our souls; we cannot too soon be initiated in this profitable discipline. Happy then is it, when disappointments and troubles teach young persons to retire, to sit alone, to keep silence from vain words, and to give themselves to meditation and prayer; whilst others of their age are running the round of folly and vice, and making work for future anguish and misery. And happy shall we all be, if we so learn to receive affliction, considering that it is laid upon us by the hand of God, as to extract good out of it. In order to this we must abase ourselves before him, in the deepest humiliation: and then, whatever reproach or injurious treatment we receive, we shall be conscious that we have no cause to complain, whilst we have the hopes of his favour, and are thus made partakers of his holiness. This submission, and dependence on God, must be safe and advantageous: for he will not cast off for ever any who trust in him. Though he cause grief, he delighteth in mercy, and not in afflicting the children of men: and when he hath humbled and proved us, he will have compassion, according to the multitude of his mercies, and do us good at the latter end. Indeed, he often permits the instruments of his correction, or his vengeance, to crush their subjects, or prisoners under their feet: but he cannot approve of injustice or oppression. Nor can they exceed their commission, or do mischief according to their own will: for, good and evil are dispensed at the mouth of God. When therefore his wise and righteous ends are answered, he terminates the power of oppressors, and rescues the oppressed. Our troubles are all from him: and when our peace is made with him, all things will certainly work together for our good. Instead then of fretting and complaining, when we suffer a small part of the punishment due to our sins: whilst the continuance of life gives ground for hope and time for prayer; we should employ ourselves in searching and trying our ways, in repenting of our sins and returning unto the Lord; and in lifting up our hearts and prayers unto our heavenly Father. We should complain to him, and not of him, and the representation of our sorrows should be always accompanied with humble confession of our transgressions.

V. 42—66.

If the Lord has not pardoned our sins, we may be sure, that it is because we have not repented and believed his Gospel: yet we may be forgiven, even though we have not the comfort of it. If we be covered with his anger, and our prayers be not answered: it may be, because we ask amiss, or have not patiently waited his time. If we be made the filth of the world, treated as the refuse of mankind, and insulted by our neighbours: we should more earnestly look to our God, and expect him to plead our cause and deliver us. But indeed our own troubles, and those of the church and world around us, continually suggest causes of sorrow: and wherever we look, our eyes may affect our hearts, and cause our tears to flow afresh. Yet we may still hope and rejoice in the Lord: no dark dungeon, or deep pit, can exclude us from his throne of grace. If we cannot speak, he will hear our breathings and our sighs. He will draw near to encourage, to defend, and to plead the cause of, his afflicted servants, and to redeem their souls. But at last what are all our sorrows compared with those of the Redeemer? "He" indeed "was the man who saw affliction, by the rod of the "Lord's wrath" against our sins; and exclaimed, "My

Thus will he deliver his people out of every trouble, and revive his church from every overwhelming persecution: thus will he raise our bodies from the grave, and save us with an everlasting salvation; whilst all his enemies will perish with an eternal destruction from his presence.

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1, 2. The nation of Israel, being devoted to and beloved of God, and Jerusalem, the holy city where he was worshipped at his temple, had excelled other nations and cities, as the most fine gold doth the baser metals; which was intimated by the gold that overlaid the walls, and formed the vessels of the sanctuary. But they were now both polluted by their sins, and disgraced by their sufferings; they had lost all their distinguished splendour and excellency, and were become base and contemptible. The temple also was totally destroyed, and its stones were thrown among the common rubbish, and mixed with the ruins of other buildings. Nay, the sons of Zion, even the most honourable and eminent of them, who ought to have been, and had been, precious as fine gold, were disregarded and dashed in pieces like the meanest earthen vessel.

V. 3—5. Through urgent famine, the women of Jerusalem seemed to be deprived of all natural affection, and were become more unfeeling to their offspring than the sea-monsters or other savage creatures. In endeavouring to preserve their own lives, they neglected to tend on their infants; and thus left them to perish, as the ostrich doth her eggs, which she leaves on the sand and looks no more after: and some of them were even far more cruel, (10.) Thus the sucking child was parched to death by thirst; the lisping children begging for bread were left to perish by hunger; and such as had been brought up most delicately and with every indulgence, lay neglected in the streets or upon dunghills, without other lodging, or other food than they could rake out of them.

V. 6. Sodom was destroyed at once by fire from heaven, and its inhabitants did not suffer so much in this world, as those of Jerusalem did, when they died in a lingering manner by famine, like criminals who are kept long in torture. And, considering the superior advantages and privileges of Jerusalem, there can be no doubt but their guilt was more aggravated than that of Sodom. This indeed is the more obvious sense of the original; (Marg.) The punishment of Jerusalem was heavier than that of Sodom; because her guilt was more aggravated. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7, 8. (Notes, Num. vi.) The Nazarites, during the time of their separation, were considered as very distinguished persons; and probably they used to wear white cloathing. Perhaps God had been pleased to give a peculiar blessing to their diet, to render them more healthy than their brethren who did not abstain from wine, so that their appearance was more vigorous and comely; and they were considered as the ornament and honour of the city. (Notes, Dan. i. 8—15. Am. ii. 11.) But now the wrath of God had made such a change in their circumstances, that by famine, disease, and neglect, they were become base and sordid in their persons and apparel, not to be distinguished from the other wretched objects with whom they were surrounded; and they were emaciated and enfeebled, so that their very neighbours scarcely knew them.

V. 9. Striken, &c. 'Their vitals are pierced through, 'as if with a sword; but with this difference, that it is 'by famine, the most cruel, because the most lingering, 'death.' (Lowth.)

11 The [y] LORD hath accomplished his fury; he hath poured out his fierce anger, and hath [z] kindled a fire in Zion, and it hath devoured the foundations thereof.

12 The [a] kings of the earth, and all the inhabitants of the world, would not have believed that the adversary and the enemy should have entered into the gates of Jerusalem.

13 ¶ For [b] the sins of her prophets, and the iniquities of her priests, [c] that have shed the blood of the just in the midst of her;

14 They [d] have wandered as blind men in the streets, [e] they have polluted themselves with blood, * so that men could not touch their garments.

15 They cried unto them, [f] Depart ye, it is † unclean; depart, depart, touch not: when they fled away and wandered, they said among the heathen, They shall no more sojourn there.

16 The ‡ anger of the LORD [g] hath divided them; [h] he will no more regard them: [i] they respected not the persons of the priests, they favoured not the elders.

V. 10. In themselves the women were disposed to compassion; but their anguish rendered them barbarous, and this added to the horror of their calamity and conduct. (Note, ii. 20—22.)

V. 11. Devoured. 'It hath made an entire destruction, so as not to leave one stone upon another.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12. Jerusalem seems to have been well fortified both by nature and art; and those who had attempted to take it, had so often been miraculously baffled and destroyed; that all the surrounding kings and nations did not think that Nebuchadnezzar would succeed in his enterprise. Nor could he, if the Lord, the real Defence of Jerusalem, had not been provoked to depart from her.—'These things are come to pass, contrary to all men's ex-'pectations.'

V. 13—16. The sins of the false prophets and ungodly priests conduced to the total degeneracy of the nation; and their murder of the prophets and righteous servants of God, and even of children offered to idols, provoked him to give them up to destruction. Thus the prophets and priests caused such numbers to be slain, that when they walked in the streets, they could not avoid being polluted with blood; as blind men, when wandering about, could not shun those things, the touch of which rendered them unclean. Nay, they were even covered with the blood of the slain, so that men could not touch their garments without being defiled. The Jews had been wont to say to a Gentile, "Stand by thyself, I am holier than thou," and to bid him depart, and keep at a distance as unclean: but now the very heathen drove them out of the city as unclean, and burned it as polluted: 'And they used the same words to express their 'abhorrence of this defilement of such per-'sons, whose office it was to cleanse and purify others, as the 'lepers were by the law obliged to pronounce on them-'selves.' (Lowth.) They considered them as monsters of wickedness; and in contempt of their former preciseness, or as loathing their vile conduct, they disdainfully shunned their company: nay, when they fled, or wandered from place to place, even the idolaters would not admit them to sojourn with them! Thus the Lord divided them into distant places: he no more regarded them as his people; and therefore their enemies no more respected their priests and elders, but considered them as the chief criminals, and the peculiar objects of their execrations.

V. 17. Vain, &c. The Jews had long in vain expected help from the Egyptians. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 18, 19. These are the desponding complaints of the remnant of the Jews. Their enemies hunted those who remained in the city, from one street to another, so that they expected death every moment; and if any of them fled to the mountains, or into the wilderness, their pursuers were as swift as eagles, and laid wait for them to destroy them. (Marg. Ref.) 'God hath brought upon us 'that judgment which he threatened by Moses, of bringing "a nation against us as swift as the eagle flieth." (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 20. 'This verse some expositors understand of 'Josiah; and thereupon ground their opinion, that the 'Lamentations were written on occasion of his death.—'But I rather conceive that Zedekiah was meant. As 'long as he was safe, we had hopes of perceiving some 'face of government, although we were carried into a 'foreign country.' (Lowth.) Perhaps the hopes of the nation, when Zedekiah was first anointed king, are intended. He was raised to the throne by the king of Babylon; and therefore they might expect to be preserved by his power from the surrounding nations, and to continue in their own land: so that they considered their national existence, so to speak, to depend on Zedekiah. But when he was hunted and taken, as a wild beast in a pit, all their hopes expired.

V. 21, 22. The Edomites insulted and rejoiced over the calamities of the Jews. (Ps. cxxxvii. 7.) The prophet therefore ironically bade them rejoice; but assured them, that their joy would soon be terminated: for the deadly cup of divine vengeance would soon be put into their hands, and reduce them to desperation and contempt. The appointed punishment of Zion would soon be completed, and their captivity terminated: and then the Lord would bring to light and punish the iniquities of Edom, or carry them into captivity for their sins. (Marg. Ref.)

No more.—'These and such like expressions, if understood in a strict literal sense, must relate to the final restoration of the Jews.' (Lowth.) Edom is frequently introduced, as representing the enemies of the church in general; and the final restoration of the Jews will be accompanied with the entire ruin of all the adversaries of the church, or speedily succeeded by it. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The glory of outward distinctions and privileges may soon be obscured; sin tarnishes the beauty of the most excellent gifts: and when the Lord leaves churches or nations, their glory is departed. But that "gold tried in "the fire" which Christ bestows, will never be taken from us; (Rev. iii. 18:) nor can its excellency be diminished. The stones of the earthly sanctuary were repeatedly poured out in the streets, so that not one of them was left upon another: but the spiritual temple experiences no such demolitions; it is built upon a Rock, against which the gates of hell cannot prevail; and every believer being one with Christ, is "an habitation of God through the Spirit." Indeed the most precious of the sons of Zion, incomparably more valuable in the sight of God than the finest gold, are esteemed by ungodly men as earthen pitchers, fit for nothing but the basest uses, or to be dashed in pieces; and not only were prophets and apostles treated in this manner, but even Christ himself was despised and vilified more than any of them. They who live themselves and bring up their children, in delicacy, elegance, and splendour, know not to what miseries they may be reserved: and such, as are most habituated to luxury and indulgence, must be doubly miserable, if reduced to the extremes of hunger, and thirst, and squalid penury, to lie on the ground and to embrace dunghills. It is therefore our interest to accustom ourselves to hardship, to deny our appetites improper gratifications, and to fear contracting such habits as may afterwards prove sources of misery. Extreme necessity has a tendency to render the heart callous and unfeeling: they who have improperly indulged their children when in prosperity, have often been most regardless of them in distress; and the human species has frequently been found more cruel and insensible than the most ferocious and stupid of the irrational creatures. The punishment of the most abandoned heathens will be light, compared with that of wicked nominal Christians: but, if the lingering pains of a tedious execution, of famine, or some fatal disease be so terrible; what will be the everlasting punishment of the wicked, when the Lord shall accomplish his fierce anger, and pour out his fury upon them as consuming fire? No enemy can prevail against us, unless he withdraw his protection: and if he do, no defence can avail. But the wickedness of those who are by office engaged to support religion, and yet betray her interests, is the great cause of national judgments, and of the ruin of flourishing churches: especially, when they have shed the blood of the just in the midst of them. They who have thus polluted their garments, have commonly been recompensed in the same way; and rendered an execration even to the vilest of mankind. The eyes of those who have provoked the Lord to have no more regard to them, must fail, in looking for vain help from those that cannot save: but they that trust in him shall never be confounded. Such as are most presumptuous in prosperity, are most apt to despond in danger and trouble: and they who have before despised the warnings and counsels of the Lord's ministers, are often excessively terrified, when their end draws nigh and their days are fulfilled; and when they can find no escape from the close pursuit of the king of terrors. If we so overrate any creature, as to account it "the breath of our nos-"trils," or to expect "to live under its shadow," we shall surely meet with disappointments and confusion: but our anointed King is indeed the Life of our souls, and we may safely live under his shadow, and rejoice in him in the midst of all our enemies; for he is the true God, and Eternal Life. All the troubles of the church will soon be accomplished; and believers ere long will have done with captivity, punishment, sin, and sorrow: but the doom of their insulting enemies approacheth; the Lord will soon bring their sins to light; he will put the cup of vengeance into their hands; and they shall drink it to the dregs, and lie down in eternal shame and sorrow.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1—6. The title of this chapter in the Vulgate, is The prayer of Jeremiah. It is an address to God, respecting the calamities of his people, as the improvement of the preceding representation of them. It consists of the same number of stanzas, as the preceding chapters; but they are much shorter, and the alphabetical order is not observed. A chorus of the Jews, or the collective body of the nation, are represented as calling on God to remember their miseries, and the reproach to which they were exposed. The inheritance which he had given to their fathers, and the houses which they had builded on it, were possessed by the Chaldeans, and other aliens from the nation of Israel: they were bereaved of their fathers, and their mothers were left destitute widows, amidst the oppressions of their enemies: they were forced, in the land of their captivity, to pay dear even for water and fuel, which they formerly had for fetching: they were grievously oppressed and persecuted, and laboured for their tyrants, without respite for refreshment: they had repeatedly been obliged to submit to the Egyptians and Assyrians, through their urgent necessities; and at last some of them were destitute strangers in Egypt, and others were captives in the regions formerly governed by the Assyrians. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7. (Marg. Ref.) The whole load of national guilt, which had been accumulating for ages, lay with incumbent weight on that generation of Israel: thus they bare the iniquities of their fathers, who were no more on earth to suffer the temporal effects of their own transgressions. Of this they were at length made sensible, and that it was the cause of their extreme miseries, which they could not escape, but by a national repentance, and conversion to God. It does not seem to have been spoken in a murmuring spirit; but in a humble acknowledgment of the justice of God, in his dealings with the nation.

V. 8—10. Even the servants of the Chaldeans domineered over the captive worshippers of God: and there was none to rescue them from their insolence and cruelty. Whilst the invasion of the land and siege of Jerusalem continued, and immediately after the city was taken, the people got their bread by hazarding their lives; as they were every where met with by their enemies, who destroyed them without mercy: and their skins were parched and turned black by the extremity of the famine that they had endured.

V. 11—16. After the city was taken, these outrages were there committed, as they had before been in the cities of Judah. Their princes were disgraced or put to death, in the most cruel manner, as slaves and malefactors: their elders, (either the members of the national council, or the aged and most venerable citizens,) were treated with indignity: their chosen strong men were enslaved, and employed in the hardest drudgery; and even the youths were loaded with wood till they fell under their burdens. So that the elders no more appeared in the gate of the city, to administer justice, or to give counsel; the young men no more entertained themselves and others with music. All their mirth was ceased, and turned into mourning: all their honour was gone; their crown was fallen from their heads, and their miseries were come upon them because of their sins.

Young men from, &c. "The chosen ones have ceased "from their Psalms." The termination of the sacred psalmody at the temple seems especially intended.

Crown. 'All our glory is at an end, together with the 'advantages of being thy people, and enjoying thy pre-'sence among us, by which we have been distinguished 'from the rest of the world.' (Lowth.)

V. 17, 18. The most distressful circumstance of all to the pious remnant, was the desolation of Zion, which was become the resort of foxes, preying upon the dead bodies that were there left unburied: as it was without temple, altar, or sacrifice; without priest or worshipper to drive them away.

19 Thou, O LORD, [e] remainest for ever; [f] thy throne from generation to generation.

20 Wherefore [g] dost thou forget us for ever, and forsake us * so long time?

21 [h] Turn thou us unto thee, O LORD, and we shall be turned; [i] renew our days as of old.

22 † But thou hast utterly [k] rejected us; thou art very wroth against us.

V. 19—22. In this deplorable case, the people of God could apply to none but their everlasting and unchangeable King, whose throne remained from age to age. They therefore anxiously inquired of him, wherefore he had so long forsaken, and seemed to forget them? They besought him to convert them unto himself, by his renewing grace; that he might return to them in mercy, and renew those prosperous days, which their nation had anciently enjoyed: and they complained, that he had utterly rejected them in his anger; or rather they inquired whether he meant thus to deal with them? 'Our only hope is in the eternity and 'unchangeableness of thy nature; and that thou still go-'vernest the world; whereby thou always art able to 'help us, and art never forgetful of the promises which 'thou hast made to thy people.' 'Do thou give us the 'grace of conversion and amendment.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In all troubles prayer is our great duty and the best means of relief; and all our sorrows should lead us to beseech the Lord to remember and help us. Though our sins and his just displeasure have caused our sufferings: yet we may hope in his pardoning mercy, his sanctifying grace, and his kind providence. As wasting wars, terrible famines, and heavy oppressions or persecutions come upon nations, for the sins of former and present generations, when their appointed measure of iniquity is filled up: so the accumulating sins of a man's whole life will be punished with tremendous vengeance at last; except he obtain an interest in Him "who bare our sins in his own body on the "tree." The wrath of God turns the sinner's mirth into mourning, his liberty into bondage, and his honour into disgrace: for this the crown is fallen from our heads, and wo unto us that we have sinned! This first reduced the race of men to its present wretched condition; and the desolations of the church originate from the same source.—But though we should mourn over the miseries of the world and the low estate of the church: yet the true Zion, to which believers are come, cannot be desolated, but remaineth for ever, even as the throne of our God in heaven. This inheritance cannot be forfeited or alienated; nor can our mansions be possessed by strangers; or our relation to God, as espoused and adopted into his family, abrogated; or the liberty, wherewith Christ hath made us free, taken from us; the freeness of our salvation disannulled; or our joy and glorying in Christ made void. Various tribulations may make our hearts faint and our eyes dim: but our way to the mercy-seat of our reconciled God still is open; and we may beseech him not to forsake or forget us; and plead with him to turn, and renew us more and more by his grace; that our hopes may revive and our consolations abound, as in the days of old. For the eternal and unchangeable God will not utterly reject his church or any true believer, whatever our trials, fears, or lamentations may be. Let us then, in all our troubles, put our whole trust and confidence in his mercy; let us confess our sins, and pour out our hearts before him; and let us watch against repinings or despondency, whatever we suffer, or witness of the troubles of our brethren; for this we surely know, that it shall be well in the event with all who trust, fear, love, and serve the Lord.

THE BOOK

OF THE

PROPHET EZEKIEL.

Ezekiel, (like Jeremiah,) was a priest as well as a prophet. He executed his office among the captives in Chaldea, during the latter part of the time that Jeremiah was employed at Jerusalem, and till some time after the destruction of that city. He seems to have been carried into captivity with Jechoniah, and he dates his prophecies from that event: though he was not called to the prophetical office, till the fifth year after; and probably, in the thirtieth year of his age (i. 1;) though some reckon this thirtieth year from Josiah's reformation, when he and Judah solemnly covenanted with God to be his people. The scope of his predictions was very similar to that of Jeremiah; but his manner was exceedingly different: for he delivered his messages with a vehemency, energy, and even terror and severity, peculiar to himself, but very suitable to the character of those to whom he prophesied: yet he seems to have been especially raised up, to animate and encourage the pious remnant among the captives, with the hope of returning prosperity; and to satisfy them that their condition was vastly preferable to that of their brethren in Judah, against whom he predicted still more tremendous judgments, terminating in the desolations of the temple of Jerusalem and Judah, and almost the extermination of the inhabitants. Some frivolous objections, grounded on gross mistakes, have been started to the authenticity, or divine inspiration of this book: but the prophecies contained in it, which have been most surprisingly fulfilled, and are fulfilling at this day, constitute a full demonstration, that Ezekiel "spake as he was moved by the Holy Spirit;" especially his prophecies concerning Tyre and Egypt, (Notes, xxvi—xxxii.) It contains also many predictions, which are not yet fulfilled, relating to the restoration of Israel, and the triumphs of the Church over all her enemies; which on careful investigation, will be found entirely to coincide with many parts of Isaiah's and Daniel's prophecies; and those contained in the Revelation of St. John (Notes, xxxvi—xxxix.) There are also several evident references to it, in the New Testament; though it is not expressly quoted. (Compare i. x. with Rev. iv. v—ix. 4. with Rev. vii. 2, 3:—and ix. 6. with 1 Pet. iv. 18.) Nor is there any doubt, but its prophecy formed a part of the sacred canon, in the days of our Lord and his Apostles. Some have observed, that the prophet's name was happily expressive of his character; as it may signify, the strength, or courage of God. Many parts of the book, however, are very figurative and obscure; and some, of which no solution entirely satisfactory seems to have been hitherto given. It opens with an account of an emblematic vision of the Lord, by which Ezekiel was called to the prophetic office. It then contains several visions, representing the calamities coming on the Jewish nation, and the Lord's departure from his temple; connected with severe reproofs of the enormous wickedness both of the Jews at Jerusalem, of the captives, and the whole nation, with their kings, princes, priests, and prophets, and awful predictions against them. Having then predicted the judgments of God against the surrounding nations, the prophet changes his style, gives both Judah and Israel intimations of great mercies in reserve; and foretels the destruction of the enemies of the Church in the latter ages: and he concludes with a remarkable vision of the temple, city, and holy land; which it is probable is an emblematical description of the prosperity of the Church in the Millennium. The whole prophecy is suited to fill the mind with awe of God's purity and justice, and hope in his mercy, and with dread and hatred of sin; and to lead the thoughts to Christ and his kingdom; and to encourage our hopes of glorious success to the cause of God on earth.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1—3. Some interpreters compute this "thirtieth year," from the reformation in the reign of Josiah: when a new Æra commenced, and another trial was made of the kingdom of Judah. Others compute them from the accession of Nabopolassar to the throne of Babylon, which formed a new Æra to the Chaldeans, coincident with that of Josiah's reformation: but others think that the prophet only meant that he was thirty years of age, before he was called to his important office. This was in the fifth year of Jehoiachin's captivity, with whom Ezekiel seems to have been carried away; and consequently it was in the fifth year of Zedekiah's reign, about six years before the final desolation of Jerusalem. The captive Jews seem to have been left some time without prophets, or visions from God, that might supply the want of the more ordinary means of instruction; (Jer. xxix:) but at length the Lord raised them up a prophet in their captivity.—Ezekiel was among the other captives by the river Chebar, (which probably was some river that ran into the Euphrates;) where they might be stationed by the victors to cultivate waste lands, or to carry on some manufacture for their benefit. Here he saw the heavens opened; and the extraordinary appearance of the firmament made way for the visions of the God of Israel. Thus the word of the Lord came to him expressly, with clearness and conviction; so that he could neither doubt of its divine authority, mistake its import, or question his appointment to the prophetical office. Some suppose, that the personal Word, or Son of God, came and spake to him, in a distinct and audible voice, as doubtless he afterwards did: (26. ii. 1.)—This revelation was accompanied with "the hand of the "LORD upon him." This may denote a divine power overcoming his reluctance to the arduous work, encouraging him to enter on it, and qualifying him for it. Or, that he was so impressed by the power of God, as to have his senses closed to external objects, and his mind prepared to contemplate the heavenly visions.

V. 4. The prophet having fixed his attention on the objects presented to his view, first "saw a whirlwind come "out of the north:" this might denote the impetuous destruction, which from Babylon was about to overwhelm Jerusalem and Judah. (Marg. Ref.) This whirlwind brought with it a great cloud; an emblem of the darkness of the Lord's dispensations, and of the heavy judgments that impended over the Jewish nation. Along with this was a fire infolding itself, or kindling itself, or burning incessantly; this might represent the justice and holiness of God, and the awful vengeance he was about to execute, for the glory of his perfections, and from motives taken from and centering in himself. The whirlwind, cloud, and fire, were similar to the tremendous appearances from mount Sinai, at the giving of the law; and intimated that the same glorious God was about to come, and inflict condign punishment on the transgressors of it. This fire diffused a brightness round about it; and from the midst of it was seen as the colour of amber, or, as some explain it, of a polished mixed metal; which might signify, that there is light enough afforded to discern something of the divine counsels and operations; and that, as far as we can understand them, they appear very splendid and glorious.—'Out of the midst of the fiery splendour, there was, 'as it were, a shining colour of amber, to signify the 'presence of God's powerful grace and mercy, in the 'midst of the fiery trials of his Church.' (Bp. Hall.) (Marg. Ref.) and they four had [z] the face of an ox on the left side; they four also had [a] the face of an eagle.

11 Thus were their faces; [b] and their wings were * stretched upward; two wings of every one were joined one to another, [c] and two covered their bodies.

12 And [d] they went every one straight forward, [e] whither the Spirit was to go they went; and they turned not when they went.

13 As for the likeness of the living creatures, [f] their appearance was like burning coals of fire, and like the appearance of lamps: it went up and down among the living creatures; and the fire was bright, and out of the fire went forth lightning.

14 And the living creatures [g] ran, and returned, as the appearance of a flash of lightning.

15 ¶ Now as I beheld the living creatures, behold, [h] one wheel upon the earth by the living creatures, [i] with his four faces.

16 The appearance of the wheels, and their work, was like unto [k] the colour of a beryl: and they four had one likeness: and their appearance, and their work, was as it were [l] a wheel in the middle of a wheel.

V. 5—14. Out of the midst of the glorious vision, the prophet saw the likeness of four living creatures. These seem to have been emblems, or an hieroglyphical representation, of the holy angels, the attendants on the King of Glory, and the ministers of his providence. They were four, probably to denote that they were employed in all the four quarters of the world, or to the four winds of heaven. Their appearance in the likeness of a man denoted that they were intelligent and rational creatures, of which that form is to us the token. But each of them had four faces, which seem to be emblematic of their endowments and characters. The face of a man implied that they possessed knowledge, foresight, prudence, compassion, and philanthropy; that of a lion intimated their boldness and force, in executing the will of God; that of an ox denoted strength, unwearied diligence, and perseverance; and that of an eagle spiritual sagacity and heavenly affections, by which they soared aloft above all created objects, to the uncreated source of holiness and felicity. 'Compare Revelation iv. 6, where our translation renders the 'word ζῶα, beasts, whereas it should be rendered living 'creatures;' the better to distinguish them from the anti-'christian beast, always expressed in that book by θηρίον.' —'In that text the four living creatures denote some part 'of the Christian Church, as appears by comparing the place 'with Rev. v. 8, 9.' (Lowth.) Indeed it seems capable of full proof, that the ministers of the Gospel are hieroglyphically described by the apostle; (Notes, Rev. iv. v:) and this being evident, some learned men have concluded, probably on insufficient grounds, that Ezekiel's vision had a similar meaning, (Note, x. 1, 2.) But the four faces, which each of these living creatures had, are divided, one to each, among the living creatures which the apostle saw: and this difference may imply, that the endowments, which are divided in various proportions among the holiest men on earth, are all conjoined in the holy angels. These living creatures were also represented with four wings each; being emblematical of the activity and celerity with which they executed the divine mandates: as their hands under their wings were of their skilfulness or dexterity, in all their services, of which at the same time they made no ostentation. 'The hand being peculiar to mankind, among 'all living creatures, and the chief instrument of all 'artificial operations.' (Lowth.) Their wings being joined together might denote the perfect unanimity which prevails among them; and their going straight forward without turning, their steadiness and constancy in obedience.—'They needed not to turn their bodies, that their faces 'might stand the way they were to go; for go which way 'they would, they had a face that looked that way. This 'signifies that nothing ever diverted them from fulfilling 'God's commands.' (Lowth.) Their wings, "stretched "upward," represented their promptitude to execute their Maker's orders; as those, with which they covered their bodies, did their conscious imperfection and meanness in his glorious presence. Their straight feet might be emblematical of simplicity and uprightness; as the sole of their feet, divided like that of the calf or other clean animals, might be of their perfect purity and holiness; and their "sparkling like the colour of burnished brass," seems to represent their superior excellency and dignity. They were also represented as going whither the Spirit was to go: which might signify the subserviency of their ministrations in the providential government of the world, to the great concerns of religion and the prosperity of the Church. Their appearance was like burning coals of fire and the appearance of lamps: which might denote their ardent zeal and love, connected with equal knowledge and wisdom. The lamps, or light, going up and down among the living creatures, might intimate, that the Fountain of Light communicated to them severally, as he pleased: and the bright fire issuing forth, as lightning, might be an emblem of the terrible effects of their ministry on the objects of the divine vengeance; or it might signify the same as their running and returning like a flash of lightning, with inexpressible velocity. (Marg. Ref.) Each of the Seraphim in Isaiah, (vi.) had six wings; and so had the living creatures, seen by the apostle: but those seen by Ezekiel had but four. 'In those texts,'—the Seraphim and the living creatures, 'use two of their 'wings to cover their faces, out of reverence to the divine 'presence, before which they stand; whereas here the 'living creatures are supposed to stand under the throne, 'as supporting it.' (Grotius in Lowth.) their four sides; [m] and they turned not when they went.

18 As for their rings, [n] they were so high that they were dreadful; and their * rings were [o] full of eyes round about them four.

19 And [p] when the living creatures went, the wheels went by them: and when the living creatures were lifted up from the earth, the wheels were lifted up.

20 Whithersoever [q] the Spirit was to go, they went, thither was their spirit to go; and the wheels were lifted up over against them: [r] for the spirit of the living creature was in the wheels.

21 When those went, these went; and when those stood, these stood; and when those were lifted up from the earth, the wheels were lifted up over against them: for the Spirit † of the living creature was in the wheels.

22 And [s] the likeness of the firmament, upon the heads of the living creature, was as the colour of the terrible crystal, stretched forth over their heads above.

23 And under the firmament were [t] their wings straight, the one toward the other: every one had two, [u] which covered on this side, and every one had two, which covered on that side, their bodies.

24 And when they went I heard the noise of their wings, [x] like the noise of great waters, [y] as the voice of the Almighty, the voice of speech [z] as the noise of an host: when they stood they let down their wings.

25 And there was a voice from the firmament that was over their heads, when they stood, [a] and had let down their wings.

V. 15—25. As the living creatures seem to be emblems of the hosts of angels, ministering to the God of Israel: so these wheels denote the mysterious dispensations of his providence. These are as the wheels of a chariot, in which JEHOVAH rideth to execute the purposes of his own will; and by them his presence and power are manifested in every place. The shape of wheels, and their aptitude for continual motion, represent the constant revolutions of human affairs, under the conduct of Providence. Those persons or communities, which to day are at the top of the wheel, may to-morrow be at the bottom, beyond all human expectation or prevention: yet in the midst of apparent confusion, and whilst every thing seems hurried on by blind chance or fatal necessity, the most perfect regularity is observed, and the changes are directed by as fixed laws, as those which regulate the motion of wheels. Whilst the prophet was contemplating the living creatures, he saw, (upon the earth, to denote that the vision related to the affairs of this lower world,) one wheel by each of them, like the four wheels of a chariot. The appearance and work of the wheels was like unto the colour of a beryl; the wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness of God's providential government might be denoted by the exquisite workmanship and beautiful colour of the wheels. The colour here intended is supposed to have been the green of the sea-water; which some think an emblem of the perpetual vicissitudes of human affairs; as the ocean is sometimes agitated by furious storms, and then sinks into a calm. The four wheels were all formed alike; for there is a consistency, and even uniformity, in the dispensations of Providence. But there was also, "as it were a "wheel in the middle of a wheel;" perhaps a smaller wheel connected with, and put in motion by, the larger; an emblem of the connexion of causes and effects, with great apparent intricacy and almost endless variety, which are governed by the sovereign will of God. Or, by one wheel passing through another of the same size at right angles, provision was made, that nothing should interrupt or retard their progress. So that when the wheels moved, they went on their four sides; or moved steadily in their proper places, without deviating or being diverted from their course by any impediments. The rings of the wheels were so high, and their circumference was so immense, that they were dreadful to look upon: an emblem of the vast designs of Providence, full of incomprehensible mysteries, to be humbly adored by us, and involving many terrible judgments on the workers of wickedness. But these rings were full of eyes all round about: which signified, that infinite knowledge and wisdom ordered every dispensation, and that the purposes of God could not be disappointed by any unforeseen conjuncture. As the living creatures went where the Spirit was to go, so the wheels followed the living creatures: for the same Spirit actuated both the living creatures and the wheels; and though the wheels were first seen on the earth, they often were lifted up above it: all which might signify, that the dispensations of God on earth are connected with heavenly things, and are all appointed in subordination to the concerns of his Church. The firmament, over the heads of the living creatures, was as the colour of the terrible crystal, (or, as some render the word, ice:) at once clear, splendid, and magnificent; and suited to impress the mind with solemn awe and terror. This might also denote that the ministry of the angels was entirely subordinate, and infinitely inferior, to the majesty and power of God. Whilst under this firmament the living creatures executed their commissions, the noise of their motion resembled that of the rushing of mighty waters, or of tremendous thunders, (called here the voice of the Almighty,) or of the shout of an army; which may give us an idea of the number and power of these ministering spirits. But when they had executed their commissions, and let down their wings, a voice was heard from the firmament; perhaps denoting the divine approbation of their services, or the communication of further orders.

V. 26—28. The emblems of the attendants and providential appointments of Israel's God having been shown, some glimpses of his divine glory are here given: but they are even more abstruse than what hath been already considered. Probably the Lord intentionally left these emblematic or hieroglyphical discoveries of himself and his works so obscure and intricate, in order that whilst they suggested the intended instruction, they might not be capable of being delineated by the painter, or tempt the statuary to form a similitude of them, (though some have absurdly tried to do it.) There appeared to the prophet, (not a real throne, but) "the likeness of a throne;" an emblem of the sovereign authority of JEHOVAH over all creatures, over both the world and the Church: and it was as the appearance of a sapphire-stone: that is, it was exquisite in beauty and splendour. Upon this likeness of a throne was the likeness as the appearance of a man, or Adam; which evidently denoted the eternal Son, the second person in the sacred Trinity, who afterwards assumed human nature, "the second Adam, the Lord from heaven," who before in the form of God was Israel's king. The appearance of amber and of fire round about the throne, and within it, and in every part of his manifested presence, being connected with the rain-bow, (a well-known emblem of the covenant of grace,) represented his mercy and covenanted love to his people, as harmonizing with his awful justice and holiness; and showed that he administered all the affairs of his kingdom with reference to his new covenant. 'We may certainly conclude, that this was the 'appearance of the second person in the blessed Trinity; '—because he appears under the resemblance of a man.'— 'The light reflected from this vision had the appearance of 'a rain-bow, a token of God's covenant of mercy; to 'denote that God, in the midst of judgment, would re-'member mercy. Especially this vision, being an evident 'representation of the Word that was to be made flesh, 'whose incarnation is the foundation of God's covenant of 'mercy with mankind, a rain-bow, the symbol and token 'of mercy, was a very fit attendant.' (Lowth.) When the prophet saw this likeness of the glory of the Lord, he fell prostrate before it in adoration, and humble consciousness of his unworthiness. The whole of this introductory vision, when reported to the people, was suited to impress their minds also with solemn awe and fear of the divine displeasure; and yet to raise their expectations of blessings from their glorious Lord and King. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—14.

When the ministers and ordinances of God have been despised and abused, he will sometimes render them precious by scarcity: but he will never leave his people entirely destitute of instruction or encouragement. They are as dear to him in captivity, in poverty, and under severe oppression, as when more prosperous. Outward circumstances cannot preclude them from his gracious manifestations: and his providence and grace will concur in qualifying them for the services for which they are intended, and in calling them forth to them. We are reminded of the incomprehensible majesty of JEHOVAH and of his infinite perfections, in all the discoveries that he hath made of himself. The humble and attentive believer may understand enough, to impress his mind with solemn awe, and to inspire filial confidence: but he must perceive such depths in every subject relative to the divine Being and perfections, as serve to teach him humility and adoration. Thus we may learn profitable lessons even from those representations which we cannot fully understand: for we may be reminded, that clouds and darkness are round about our God; whilst judgment and justice are the basis of his throne. "A consuming fire goeth before him, and it is "very tempestuous round about him," not only when he speaks from mount Sinai, but even when he shows his glory from mount Zion, as the God and Father of his people. Light enough is afforded us to discover, that he doeth all in wisdom, truth, justice, and goodness: but who can declare the depths of his counsels and operations? Let us then attend to those things, which relate to our peace and duty; and leave secret things to the Lord, to whom alone they belong. By faith we may behold him surrounded with an innumerable company of angels, who excel in wisdom and strength, and in all created and communicable perfections: and whilst we contemplate the discoveries of their character and services, we should pray to be made like them here, as we hope hereafter to be equal to them. We should study and copy the wisdom, zeal, alacrity, and diligence, by which they are constantly actuated and directed: and though we cannot reach the exalted strains of their worship, or the perfection of their services; though we have not their wings, but are clogged by these vile bodies, and unable to mount with their rapid flight, or obey with their celerity; yet we may labour with patience and constancy; we may fill up our stations with intelligence and skill; we may go about our work with boldness, and not fear the frown or wrath of man; we may set our affections on heavenly things, and cultivate harmony and love with our brethren and fellow servants; we may go straight forward, undiverted from our path by the smiles or frowns of the world; we may be cloathed with humility, and serve the Lord with gladness; we may exercise ourselves to have a conscience void of offence towards God and man; and simply give up ourselves to be disposed of, employed, and guided by his Spirit, according to his revealed will, without preferring our own inclinations, secular interests, or honour, to his glory. These things, by the grace of God, may be attained in some good measure here on earth: and then a blessed change may be expected; when sin shall be done away for ever, when our bodies will be made spiritual, and we may emulate with success the worship and services of these blessed spirits before the throne, who run and return like a flash of lightning. At present we should consider them as the ministers of providence, both in justice and mercy; especially as sent forth to minister unto the heirs of salvation, who owe numberless deliverances to their condescending and watchful care. Whilst this should instruct us to imitate their conduct, in our attention to our poor and afflicted brethren, it should endear them to us, though unseen, and make us long for that time when we shall join their blissful society.

While we aim to know and fill up our proper place in the church and in the world; and to serve our generation with cheerful diligence; let us be satisfied with being informed in general, that the Lord guides the wheels of providence as well as of nature: amidst all the apparent intricacies and unnumbered vicissitudes, the whole is directed with an unerring hand: and whether at the top, or at the bottom of the wheel, our place is assigned by him: and for our good, if we be indeed his people. Nor need we despond in the lowest scenes of adversity; for the wheels keep turning round, and will raise us again in due time from our depression: whilst they, who presume upon prosperity, know not how soon they may be cast down. The dispensations of Providence are ordered under the influence of that Spirit, which sanctifies the Church and dwells in the heart of every believer: if then the vast designs of omnipotent wisdom dismay and perplex us; if the view of the Lord's awful power and justice alarm us; let us look to Him, who filleth the mediatorial throne, and ruleth over all worlds, and who shall soon appear on the judgment-seat. And, considering that he dwells in our nature, and is our Brother and our Friend; and that he administers all things in subserviency to that everlasting covenant, the blessings of which he purchased with his blood; we may resume our confidence, and possess a cheerful hope tempering our reverence and godly fear. That covenant is ordered in all things and sure, and, like its great Surety, is "the same yesterday, to-day, and "for ever:" and though the voice of the Almighty be in itself terrible to us sinful creatures; yet it is most encouraging from the gracious lips of his well-beloved Son. The light of the glory of our God is here more distinctly viewed, as it appears in softened lustre: here we see a just God and a Saviour; a consuming fire to obstinate transgressors, but a most faithful Friend to all who flee to him for refuge. Let sinners then throng to and prostrate themselves before him on his throne of grace, encouraged by his love, while awed by his majesty, justice, and power: and then they will not tremble when he shall appear on his great tribunal. And let believers more and more contemplate his glory, that they may be gradually changed into his image, by the Spirit of the Lord.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1, 2. Daniel is once called "son of "man." (Dan. viii. 17.) but Ezekiel is the only prophet that is generally thus addressed. He had been admitted, as it were, to the society of the spirits before the throne: but this must not cause him to forget, that he was a son of man, a child of Adam, a sinful, frail, and dying creature; though the Lord was pleased to send him to his people, rather than any of the holy angels that ministered before him. As Christ commonly called himself, and was often called by others, "The Son of Man," the title may also be considered as an honourable distinction. It was indeed the Redeemer's lowest style, as he is also "the Son of "God;" yet it was a peculiar honour to him to be the chief of all the sons of Adam, and the only one who was free from sin, and well pleasing to God on his own account. And, though this was not the case with Ezekiel, yet he was highly favoured, in being admitted to these visions of God, and employed in the prophetical office, while the nation and the priestly family were in so great affliction and disgrace. When he lay prostrate in an adoring posture upon the earth, he was not so well prepared to receive and execute the divine mandates: and therefore he was ordered to arise and stand on his feet; and the Spirit of prophecy, communicated to him, encouraged and enabled him so to do.

4 For [f] they are * impudent children, and stiff-hearted: I do send thee unto them, and thou shalt say unto them, [g] Thus saith the Lord GOD.

V. 3—5. The Lord, appearing in vision in the likeness of a man, (i. 26.) commissioned the prophet to go in his name to the house of Israel. His personal ministry was confined to the captives in Chaldea: but the Jews in their own land and the dispersed Israelites were included in his commission; many of his predictions and reproofs related to them, and his writings would reach them: and though he delivered prophecies concerning other nations, yet they all had reference to the nations of Israel and Judah; (the original is rebellious nations.) For thus God described them; as from generation to generation they had continued to rebel against him, and were still disposed to do the same. They were a shameless, daring, and hardened race of obstinate transgressors: 'impudent in their 'countenances and hardened in their hearts:' yet they must not be wholly given up, being favoured for their fathers' sake, and because of the Messiah that was to be raised up among them. A few might be better disposed; others especially of the rising generation might be reclaimed, and the rest would be left without excuse. The prophet was therefore to go to them, and to preface his message, with, "Thus saith the Lord GOD." And whether they would or would not regard his message; (for they were so rebellious, that he might expect many of them to treat it with contempt;) yet they would know by the event, that a prophet had been sent to them: for his predictions would assuredly be verified.

V. 6. The prophet was here warned to arm himself with courage and patience: for he must expect ill treatment from the rebels, if he faithfully stood up for the authority, law, truth, and glory of God. They were in themselves as worthless and noxious as thorns and briers; yea, as venomous and malignant as scorpions: and their company would be as uneasy to him as the thorns and briers, which tear the flesh of those who fall down among them, or endeavour to pass through them: nay, they would attempt to destroy him as scorpions. And even their menacing words and looks would intimidate and silence him, except he were upheld by faith and the fear of God.—'The prophets and messengers of God are often exhorted 'to take courage, without fearing any man's person, or standing in awe of any man's greatness. Such a presence 'of mind is expressed by παῤῥησία (boldness)—in the New 'Testament. And they have need of great presence of 'mind, who are to reprove men hardened in sin, who are 'always impatient of reproof, and become enemies of 'those, who tell them such truths as they have no mind to 'hear.' (Lowth.)

V. 8. The prophet would be especially tempted to decline his work, or to shun to declare the whole counsel of God, before such obstinate rebels and furious opposers. Probably, at this very time he was unwilling to undertake a service which appeared so perilous and discouraging. But the Lord showed him, that his refusal or unfaithfulness would rank him also among the rebels, and warned him not to imitate their vile conduct. He was therefore ordered to open his mouth, and eat the roll which would be given him: that is, he must receive, study, and digest it in his mind; that he might be prepared to speak the contents of it to the people, without fear or hesitation. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9, 10. Whilst these words were speaking, the prophet saw a hand sent unto him, which had in it a roll of parchment, or of such other materials as were then used to write upon. This roll being opened before him, he saw it every where written with "Lamentations, and mourning, "and wo." This showed the heavy judgments, that he would have to denounce against his rebellious people; the performance of which would cause them to lament and mourn, and would render them most miserable.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We should attend to the word of God, with a disposition to yield a prompt obedience to it. When he calls upon the sinner to awake, arise, and attend to the concerns of his soul, to repent and be converted, and believe the Gospel; the Spirit of life and grace accompanies the call, and as it were sets him on his feet, and enables him to do what indeed before was his duty, but which he had neither will nor power to perform. The same blessed influence must be depended on by ministers and Christians, in every service to which they are called. Human depravity never appears so great, as in the impudent, daring, obstinate, and atrocious wickedness of those, who have been most

Ezekiel, being made to eat the roll, finds it very sweet, 1—3. God encourages him for the work, and warns him to be faithful, 4—11. favoured with the means of grace. Yet the Lord will not forsake his Church, though multitudes of such base characters have in every age infested it. He knows how to discriminate between the precious and the vile, and to estimate the degree of men's rebellion: and he often sends his ministers to those whom he foresees will not regard their word. But whilst they rebuke and warn with all authority in his name, he will be glorified and they will be accepted, whether men will hear or whether they will forbear: and they, who have most despised the word of God when faithfully preached, will know, when condemned for neglecting so great salvation, that a prophet hath been among them. The more outrageous and insolent sinners are in wickedness, the more bold and faithful must ministers be in addressing them: they cannot please men and serve Christ; they must be armed with that mind which was in him, that they may be prepared to endure hardship and to bear the cross: they must expect to be harassed by briers and thorns, if not to dwell with scorpions; and it would be vain to look for ease, comfort, or safety, in such a situation, except from the Lord. They must not then fear the proud looks or blustering words, the mockings, revilings, or menaces, of powerful rebels: but must trust in God's protection, speak his words, and fear nothing but being numbered by him among the rebellious, or being seduced or terrified to copy, or countenance their ungodliness: and they must diligently hear the words of God, and meditate on them continually, that they may be earnest in their work and well qualified for it. They who are most acquainted with the Scripture will most clearly perceive, that it is every where filled with lamentations, mourning, and wo to impenitent sinners, whether infidels, profligates, pharisees, or hypocrites; and that all the grace and precious promises of the Gospel will eventually be confined to the penitent, believing, and obedient servants of God.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1—3. The Lord Christ, the eternal Word, from his throne, here continued to speak to his prophet. He ordered him to eat what he found; that is, to receive into his mind and heart the revelations made to him, without objecting to any part of them. He was to receive the truths of God as the food of his soul, and to feed upon them by faith, and with a spiritual relish; and whatever he thus found would prove wholesome and nutrimental. When he had eaten the roll of the book, he was ordered to go and speak to the house of Israel. Accordingly he opened his mouth, and the Lord fed him with the roll; as an emblem, that he communicates his truth to all whose hearts are prepared to receive it. He must also meditate on every part of this roll, that his judgment might be formed on it, his memory stored with it, and his affections regulated by it; as the stomach digests, and the bowels assimilate the food for the nourishment of our bodies. Accordingly he did so; and the roll, though written within and without with lamentations, and mourning, and wo, was in his mouth as honey for sweetness. The revelation of future events, and the meditation on the truths of God's word, were very pleasant; and perhaps the first thoughts of being honoured as a prophet were agreeable: but when he afterwards considered what predictions and denunciations he was to deliver to the people; that these would increase their condemnation; and that he would be hated and persecuted on this account, his spirit was much embittered. (Rev. x. 8—11.)

10 Moreover, he said unto me, Son of man, all my words that I shall speak unto thee [o] receive in thine heart, and hear with thine ears.

11 And go, [p] get thee to them of the captivity, unto [q] the children of thy people, and [r] speak unto them, and tell them, Thus saith the Lord GOD; whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear.

12 Then [s] the Spirit took me up, and I heard behind me [t] a voice of a great rushing, saying, [u] Blessed be [x] the glory of the LORD from his place.

13 I heard also [y] the noise of the wings of the living creatures that * touched one another, [z] and the noise of the wheels over against them, and a noise of a great rushing.

14 So [a] the Spirit lifted me up, and took me away, and I went † in bitterness, in the heat of my spirit; [b] but the hand of the LORD was strong upon me.

15 Then I came to them of the captivity at Tel-abib, [c] that dwelt by the river of Chebar, and I [d] sat where they sat, and remained there astonished among them seven days.

16 ¶ And it came to pass at the end of seven days, that the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

17 Son of man, [e] I have made thee [f] a watchman unto the house of Israel: therefore [g] hear the word at my mouth, and give them warning from me.

18 When [h] I say unto the wicked, Thou shalt surely die; and thou givest him not warning, nor speakest to warn the wicked from his wicked way, [i] to save his life; [k] the same wicked man shall die in his iniquity: [l] but his blood will I require at thine hand.

19 Yet [m] if thou warn the wicked, and he turn not from his wickedness, nor

V. 4—11. The prophet seems to have been very reluctant to his work; and therefore he was repeatedly urged to it. He was not sent, (as Jonah had been,) to Nineveh, or to any of the surrounding nations, whose language, not being understood by him, would have appeared strange and uncouth, nor could he have spoken to them but by an interpreter: but he was sent to his own people, even the nation of Israel. Yet had he gone to any of the nations who were strangers to the language and religion of Israel, they would have been better disposed to attend to him: their hearts were not so hard, nor their consciences so seared, as those of Israel were become, by continually sinning against convictions and abusing their peculiar advantages; and therefore they would have been more susceptible of terror or shame. But the Israelites would not hearken to the prophet, for they would not hearken to the Lord himself; being almost universally impudent and hardened in their impiety. At the same time that God informed Ezekiel of the ill success of his ministry, he assured him that he had prepared, or would qualify, him to encounter opposition, by giving him abundant intrepidity and firmness: so that with dauntless courage he should be enabled to oppose and reprove their sins; insomuch that their frowns and menaces should make no more impression on him, than on an adamant, which is harder than a flint. (Marg. Ref.) And therefore, depending on this promise of support in the hour of trial, he ought to dismiss his present fears: and having heard and well understood all the words that God sent him to speak, he should go immediately to his captive brethren, and declare them with all plainness and authority. 'He showeth, '(10.) what is meant by eating the book; which is, that 'the ministers of God may speak nothing of themselves, 'but that only which they have received of the Lord.'

V. 12—15. As the prophet seems still to have shown a reluctancy to his work, he was supernaturally apprehended by the Spirit of prophecy, and conveyed to the persons to whom he was to deliver his message; (Marg. Ref.) and the vision still continuing, he heard, as he was departing, the voice of a great rushing. This some suppose to have been an emblem of the great commotions which he was about to predict. It, however, proceeded from the living creatures, the hosts of angels; who at the same time "blessed the glory of the LORD from his place;" or adored the displays of his glory, in all these dispensations and appointments. 'The words imply, that though God 'should forsake his temple (ix. 3.) and destroy the place 'that is called by his name; yet his presence will make 'a temple of every place, and multitudes of the heavenly 'host will always be ready to do him service.' (Lowth.) —The noise of the wings of the living creatures, which touched each other, and the noise of the wheels, intimated that the unanimous ministrations of angels and the dispensations of Providence would concur with the predictions of the prophet. Thus he was lifted up and taken away: but he went in great bitterness and heat of his spirit. The joy which he first experienced, in receiving the divine message, was quickly turned into anguish and dismay, at the prospect of those calamities which were coming on his people; and probably because of the opposition which he had to encounter. But he was unable to withstand the divine power which constrained him to proceed. Then he came to the captives at Tel-abib, &c. 'These seem to have 'been a distinct colony—from those that are mentioned 'i. 3.' (Lowth.) Here he continued seven days among the captives, without delivering his message, either making observations on their conduct, or as some think, waiting for the sabbath, as the best time to speak to them. But he was filled with terror and astonishment at what he had seen and heard. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 17—19. (Marg. Ref.) For the admonition, as well as instruction, of the prophet; that he might understand the nature of his office, and the indispensable necessity of faithfully performing it; the Lord expressly declared that he had appointed him a watchman to the house of Israel. The watchmen were stationed to keep a constant look out, that they might discern the enemy or danger at a distance, and warn the people to avoid or repel them; but if they neglected to watch or to give warning, they would be chargeable with the murder of such as perished through their negligence. In like manner, a centinel in the army, though often exposed to danger from the enemy, is in greater danger from his commander, if he desert his post or do not attend to his duty. But if the watchman gave notice of the approaching danger, and the people neglected to profit by the warning, they might indeed be cut off, but he would be guiltless. Thus the Lord had appointed the prophet to observe, and to report to his people, the dangers to which their sins exposed them: this he was required to do, by hearing the word of the Lord, and warning them from him. And if he did not fairly report to the wicked the sentence of death and destruction, which the Lord had passed upon them, warning them to repent and turn from their wicked ways, that they might save their lives; they would then be cut off by divine judgments in their sins, and the prophet would be condemned as their murderer. But if he gave the wicked fair warning, and they still went on in their sins, and perished, he would be free from guilt, and not be considered as accessary to their ruin. So that there were sufficient reasons why he should be very faithful, though exposed to much contempt and persecution, and apparently unsuccessful; as this would be the only way, in which he could avoid being involved in the guilt and ruin of his people. 'The wicked man shall die in a 'state of sin, and be condemned to those punishments, to 'which death translates sinners. (John viii. 24.) Thou 'shalt be justly accountable for the loss of his soul, just as 'a man's blood is laid to the charge of him, that is any 'way accessary to his death.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 20, 21. 'If he, that hath been instructed in the 'right way, turn back.' 'His righteous deeds seemed to 'be done in faith, and were not.' (Marg. Ref.) 'When a 'man who carries himself as righteous, and is in his whole 'course inoffensive, doth turn away from that his holy 'profession, and give himself over to a trade of wicked-'ness, and I meet with him in that sinful course, and 'surprise him with my judgments, he shall die, &c.— 'Those good actions, which he had formerly done, and 'his forepast holy carriage, shall not be so respected as to 'keep him from just condemnation.' (Bp. Hall.) If one of the few righteous should turn aside from his religion and righteousness, to the commission of iniquity: if the heart-searching God should be pleased to lead him into such circumstances as tended to make trial of him, and to call forth his concealed lusts, and thus to prove a stumbling block in his way: and if the prophet should neglect to warn him of his danger, and through his neglect the man should fall and perish in his sins, notwithstanding all the righteousness that he had done, (which could not atone for his sins, and indeed could only be external;) in that case the prophet would be condemned as accessary to his destruction. But if he faithfully warned the righteous, and put them upon their guard against apostacy and iniquity, the Lord would bless his warnings, to preserve them from sin, and to promote their salvation; and the prophet would also be accepted, and be pure from the blood even of such as perished notwithstanding. The Scriptures speak of persons and characters, as they appear to men. Many, who have been thought true believers, have apostatized and died in sin, as far as man can see: and if indeed a real Christian should thus apostatize and die impenitent, his righteousness would not be remembered, and he would perish in his sins. But the security of the covenant of grace is this, "God will put his fear into the hearts of his people, that "they shall not thus depart from him." And the holy Scriptures are every where written in a popular style: and not with that studied regard to exact consistency, which appears in the works of very systematical divines.

thou shalt be dumb, [i] and shalt not be to them a * reprover: [k] for they are a rebellious house.

27 But when I speak with thee, [l] I will open thy mouth, and thou shalt say unto them, [m] Thus saith the LORD God; He that heareth, let him hear; and he that forbeareth, let him forbear: for they are a rebellious house.

V. 22—27. The prophet, being powerfully impelled to follow the divine direction, was led forth into the plain, that the Lord might further commune with him. There he had the same vision of the glory of God, with the same effects, as before. And he was ordered to go and shut himself up in his house; there to wait for more particular instructions, in solitude, prayer, and meditation. He was also informed, that they would put bands upon him; either his friends, as supposing him beside himself, or his enemies, as enraged by his predictions. Some, however, explain this of the transactions recorded in the next chapter.—His confinement and bands were emblems of the Jews, when shut up in Jerusalem by the Chaldeans; and of their bondage after the city was taken. Thus he was prevented from going among the people: nay, the Lord declared that he would cause him to be dumb, that he might not be a reprover to them, because of their rebellion. Probably these restraints were meant as a rebuke to the prophet, for his unbelieving fears and reluctancy to his work; and to teach him submission to the divine will: but they were also intended to correct or punish the people, who were not disposed to welcome a faithful reprover; and probably they had shown some tokens of contempt and enmity, whilst he sat amongst them at Tel-abib. However, the prophet would not always continue thus silent: but it was not intended that he should speak when he pleased, or when the people required him; but when the Lord spake to him. Then he would open his mouth, and enable him to deliver his message with boldness and authority; and placing life and death, the blessing and the curse, before the people, to leave them to their choice, and the effects of it, whether they would hear or forbear.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—15.

We should readily receive the whole word of God; for every part of it is salutary and beneficial. Its doctrines, promises, precepts, warnings, examples, and denunciations, may all be turned into wholesome nourishment by faith and prayer; nay, the believer may deduce sweetness and comfort from those passages, which speak terror to the ungodly, whilst he thinks of Him, who hath "delivered him "from the wrath to come." The word of Christ should therefore dwell richly in us; but especially in those, who are to speak it to others; for if they are not well acquainted with it, and experienced in it, they will not be able rightly to divide it, and apply it to their hearers. The Lord is always ready to communicate divine instruction to those, whose minds are open to receive it: and to assist their endeavours to understand the Scriptures. But, however sweet retirement, meditation, and communion with God may be, yet we must prepare also for active service. We may say upon the mount, It is good to be here: but we must descend to struggle with temptations, to endure hardships, to face opposition, to bear our cross, and to follow our suffering Lord. The work of the ministry generally appears very pleasant in the prospect, and whilst pious men are studying and preparing for it; and doubtless it is a good and most desirable work: yet they, who mean as ministers to be valiant for the truth in this rebellious world, must prepare for severe trials and conflicts. However, we need not hesitate to speak the words of God unto the people: for if we act by his commission, and according to his instructions, we may be sure that he will bear us out. But faithful ministers will often meet with more difficulties among false brethren, than among profligates: and they, who are sent to poor Indians and Pagans, have frequently found them more open to instruction and conviction, than men in Christian countries. So that their hard language, not to be understood without an interpreter, has not so much impeded their success, as the daring and hardened impiety of persons brought up under the sound of the Gospel, would have done. When sinners are very bold in the service of Satan, we should not be cowardly in the cause of God: when impiety and infidelity wax insolent and impudent, we should grow more strenuous and zealous in opposing them: and if our enemies set their faces as a flint, and make their brow as brass; the Lord can make ours as the adamant, and enable us to withstand deceivers and opposers to the face, without fearing their frowns, threatenings, or rage. But we should remember, that his promises are intended to encourage us to attend on our duty. Having therefore such assurances of strength and support in the hour of trial, we can have no just cause to fear any enemy: and if we receive in our hearts, as well as hear with our ears, all the words of God; and then speak to the people, as we have opportunity, whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear, it should not greatly disquiet us, if they, who despise the commandments of God, will not hearken to our words. But though these things be our evident duty; and though there be a disposition to attend to them; yet nature will object to, and struggle against, such difficult and perilous services. And though the Spirit of God powerfully operate on our fears, affections, and consciences, and we cannot but go whither he sends us, and speak what he bids us, yet we may often feel great impatience and uneasiness, and go in the bitterness and heat of our spirit. So that, whilst angels are adoring the condescension of our God, in employing such sinful worms in his honourable work, and blessing him for the displays of his glory in his gracious dealings with us; and all are unanimously concurring in the execution of his purposes; we poor sinners, though especially favoured and honoured, may be discontented and repining at the services allotted us! Indeed, it must be allowed to be very discouraging, when we are sent where there is little hope of being useful: and, especially, when the more our hearers are observed, the more desperate their wickedness appears to be. It may also astonish and almost stupify any considerate man, to compare the awful denunciations of God's word with the lives of most who profess to believe it. We must not, however, spend much time, in associating with sinners, merely to make our observations; except in order to discover the best time and manner of addressing them: and even here timidity and carnal prudence will be apt to insinuate, and dispose us to conceal or soften our message. Yet if the Lord indeed intend us to preach his word, he will renew his calls, and constrain our obedience, by his strong hand upon us.

V. 16—27.

What an awful, important, and arduous work, is the ministry of the Gospel? If we are unfaithful, we expose ourselves to the severest indignation of God, and become guilty of the murder of the souls which perish by our default: and if we are faithful, we must expect to excite the indignation of all who do not profit by our solemn warnings. These considerations should render every one cautious, from what motives, and in what manner, he engages; that he may be sure the Lord hath made him a watchman: they should teach us all to "take heed to our-"selves, and to the ministry that we have received of the "Lord, that we may fulfil it;" and to guard against ambition, avarice, and every thing that may tempt us to unfaithfulness: they should excite us to continual prayer for the increase of faith, spiritual knowledge, and that sufficiency which the Lord alone can bestow; and to keep before our minds the awful account that must be rendered, if sinners perish by our fault; that "the fear of him who "is able to destroy both body and soul in hell," may subordinate all our fears of those "who can only kill the "body, and after that have no more that they can do." We cannot indeed prevail with men to attend to the truths and will of God: but we may hear his word, and declare it unto them, showing them plainly both their danger and their remedy: and if we do this fully and faithfully, we shall deliver our own souls, even though they perish in their sins. We should also remember, that we are required, not only to encourage and comfort those who appear to us to be righteous: they too must be warned; for it is by such warnings, that the Lord puts the upright upon their guard, and thus they are preserved from sin unto salvation; and the minister is also exempted from guilt, as to those who deceive themselves, or turn back and perish in their evil ways. For many, of whom men have been most confident, have grown high-minded and secure; have met with stumbling-blocks in their way, and have fallen and died in their iniquity. So that nothing, except actual perseverance, absolutely evinces the reality of grace and soundness of heart: and the unfaithful preacher, who does not warn men of these dangers, becomes guilty of their ruin, and their blood will be required at his hands. Surely then we should study to be very explicit and particular in our ministry: and seek to profit, rather than to please or be commended by, our hearers! And surely the hearers of the Gospel should not expect from those who watch for their souls, and have such an account to give of their ministry, smooth and soothing discourses; but very alarming and distinguishing warnings, exhortations, and reproofs. Gentleness and caution are not the most requisite qualifications for a watchman, when the house is on fire, or the assassin is about to murder those who are asleep. They do not accuse him of impertinence or rudeness, if he awake them even with noise and violence; but in such a case prefer earnestness to courtesy: and should they not judge in like manner, when their souls are in danger? And ought not the feelings of the minister, who fears lest the blood of the people should be required at his hands, be consulted, as well as those of the auditors, who cannot endure to hear of the terror of the Lord?—But even where the minister does not allowedly temporize, but is obedient in many things to the word of God, he may in others expose himself to rebuke and chastisement, by timidity and procrastination: and the Lord sometimes lays aside for a season such as have sinfully declined opportunities of usefulness. Where, however, the heart is upright, they will profit even by such rebukes and suspensions. The Lord's condescension in showing us his glory, and communing with us sinful worms, notwithstanding our peevishness, is very wonderful: but he will convince us of our insufficiency for any good thing, if he intend to use us as his instruments.—Meditation, study, and prayer, are proper preparations for service: yet, after all, we should be dumb, when called to speak in the Lord's name, if he did not open our mouths, give us our message, and supply us with utterance and boldness. By painful experiences his servants are taught humble submission, and dependence on him: and if they adhere to their instructions, they will be a sweet savour unto God, both in those who hear, and in those who rebelliously reject or abuse their word; and whoever attempts to silence them, takes the readiest way of bringing the heaviest judgments on himself, and on the community to which he belongs.

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1—8. The captives in Chaldea, as well as the Jews in their own land, vainly hoped that Jerusalem would be preserved, and that they should be delivered from the power of the king of Babylon: but Ezekiel by this sign was ordered to show them the contrary. It is probable that this occurred, whilst he was shut up in his own house, and unable to speak to the people: for by signs he might instruct such as came to him; and when his extraordinary conduct came to be known, many would go to see him from different motives. Thus the affair would become generally known amongst the captives; and in due time be published and explained to the whole nation. It seems to have been a real transaction, and not a vision: and all objections to this construction, taken from the uneasiness of the prophet in the situation here described, arise from forgetfulness of the power of God, who can render his servants easy in any situation.—He was ordered to draw a picture of Jerusalem on a tile, (an emblem of the meanness to which sin had reduced that holy city, and the speedy destruction that awaited it;) that so by a general likeness every spectator might know what city was intended. He was then directed to place around it the similitude of those engines and works, that were used in sieges; and to take an iron pan, or a circular piece of iron, to place round the city as a wall; denoting the fortifications of Jerusalem, and the obstinate defence that would be made by its inhabitants. He himself represented the besiegers, by setting his face against the picture of the city. For three hundred and ninety days he was ordered to lie on his left side: these days denoted so many years: and may be calculated from the establishment of idolatry by Jeroboam in the kingdom of Israel, to the final desolations of the whole land by Nebuzaradan, in the twenty-third year of Nebuchadnezzar, which the best chronologers compute to have been exactly three hundred and ninety years. (Jer. lii. 30.) In the siege of Jerusalem, and the ruin of the nation, they bore the punishment of their iniquity committed during those years; and Ezekiel, by lying so long on his left side, as a sign to them, typically bore it for them. When he had accomplished those days, he was ordered to lie forty more on his right side: which represented the forty years, that intervened betwixt Josiah's reformation and the same final desolations of the land, and were the more immediate cause of that catastrophe.—Some think that these four hundred and thirty days relate also to the days of the siege, deducting some time for the departure of the besiegers, when they went to fight with the Egyptians; but this is uncertain. The prophet was thus required to set himself against Jerusalem, and to make bare, or stretch out, his arm, to represent the force and fury with which the Chaldeans would conduct the siege. By this sign he prophesied against it: and the Lord would lay bands on him; that is, he would powerfully enable, and even constrain, him, to lie quietly in the posture appointed him, till the days were accomplished. (Note, viii. 1.)

given thee cow's dung for man's dung, and thou shalt prepare thy bread therewith.

16 Moreover he said unto me, Son of man, behold, [u] I will break the staff of bread in Jerusalem, and they shall [x] eat bread by weight, and with care; and they shall drink water by measure, and with astonishment:

17 That they may want bread and water, and be astonied one with another, [y] and consume away for their iniquity.

V. 9—17. The prophet was moreover ordered to represent the famine, that would prevail during the siege and among the captives, by the food which he used whilst thus made a sign to them. His bread, which was his chief or only support, was to be made of different sorts of grain and pulse mixed together, several of which were seldom used for bread, except in times of urgent scarcity. This he was ordered to prepare beforehand for the three hundred and ninety days, during which he lay on his left side; for he might afterwards prepare for the other forty days. Of this coarse and unpalatable bread he was allowed not much more than ten ounces a day, as small a quantity as life could well be supported with; nor was he to drink more than about a pint and half of water a day, without any other liquor. This denoted, that the besieged Jews, and afterwards the captives, would be reduced to very scanty allowance of the coarsest food; and that they would suffer as much by thirst as by famine. This bread was to be eaten as barley-cakes, as ordinary food, dressed in the meanest and hastiest manner: and to show how the Jews would be reduced to feed on such things as at other times they would have nauseated, and that they would be constrained to disregard the distinction betwixt clean and unclean meats, he was ordered to use human dung, as fuel in baking the cakes, and to do it in the sight of the people, that they might know it. The prophet seems not to have objected to any other part of the Lord's injunctions, except this. He did not urge, that the representation of the siege would expose him to contempt; that it would subject him to reproach, thus to appear as the enemy of Jerusalem; that the allotted provisions were so coarse and scanty, that his health would be ruined by living so long on them; or that the posture in which he was to lie would be very painful and distressing. In all these respects he unreservedly acquiesced: but supposing, that by this last appointment he should contract ceremonial defilement, he objected that he had never been used to pollute his soul by eating any thing unclean, from his youth up to that day. (Marg. Ref.) And though his scruple was groundless, yet the Lord condescended to allow him to use cow's dung for fuel, instead of human dung. By the subsequent explication it appears, that though the hardships to be endured by the captives might be included; yet that the famine, which raged in Jerusalem during the siege, was principally intended. Then the Lord would break the staff of bread, which is the chief support of life: and their bread and water being measured to them in very small quantities, they must eat and drink with astonishment, perceiving how fast their scanty stock of provisions wasted, and how soon they were likely to perish miserably by hunger.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

All our powers and capacities should be used, in receiving instruction from God, and in promoting his glory, as far as they are capable of it. In various ways he preaches to our senses: his word addresses our ears as the avenues to the heart; the sacramental signs and pledges of spiritual blessings preach to our eyes, that by them we may be instructed and affected. These external representations often appear mean and despicable to the proud, carnal, and ignorant, who look no further than the outward sign: but to the humble, enlightened, and spiritual mind, they are replete with instruction, caution, and encouragement. For such persons will inquire into the meaning of every external observance, especially those which are of divine appointment; and search out their use and intention, that they may profit by them. The Lord often calls his most favoured servants to the sharpest sufferings and the hardest services; which would be very distressing to them, were they not assured of proportionable supports. But no self-denial, labour, scanty unsavoury fare, hard lodging, or uneasy posture, can render those uncomfortable, to whom the Lord manifests his gracious presence, and communicates his abundant consolations. When we consider what severe and long continued self-denial our gracious God of old required of his servants; and recollect that it was their wisdom and happiness as well as duty to render it; we shall be the better reconciled to the exercise of that moderate self-denial to which he calls us; and shall be shamed out of our reluctancy to it, and impatience under it.—They who love the souls of men, would be ready to endure any temporal inconvenience or suffering, to bring them to a sense of their guilt and danger, and to take them off from presumptuous confidences: and, as example is more convincing than words, it behooves all, who desire to be useful ministers, to habituate themselves to a holy indifference about worldly pleasures and interests; that they may exemplify the duties which they inculcate, and, by their obedience to apparently hard commands, put those to shame who refuse obedience in the most favourable circumstances. Indeed, when we consider with what evils sin hath filled the earth, we should all prepare for the worst: we know not how soon we may be forced to eat our refuse food by measure, and to drink our short allowance of water with astonishment; and be glad of the meanest sustenance which we now loathe and throw away. But if Jesus have delivered us from the wrath to come, and we have long been habituated to the practice of holiness, we shall more fear sin and pollution, than any external hardship: and whatever troubles we experience, we shall not be left to consume away in our iniquities.—No external profession or privilege can exempt sinners from deserved punishment: the Lord will set his face against hypocrites, as well as infidels and profligates; and his ministers must do the same, however they may be reviled for it. All, who do not repent and believe the Gospel, must at length bear their own iniquity in that place of torment, where not so much as a drop of water can be procured to cool the tongue: and they, who are connected with the wicked, often suffer many temporal afflictions in consequence of it. But Christ alone bare our sins, in his own body on the tree: to expiate our guilt, he fasted, thirsted, agonized, and died. They who believe in him, "shall not come into condemnation; but are passed from "death unto life:" and as he shows such compassion even to their scruples; they should not attempt to impose on their brethren the most indifferent observances, which are professedly declined from a principle of conscience.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1—4. This command seems to have been given about the same time as the foregoing. The barber's razor was to be used in shaving his head and beard; the sharp knife or sword, in smiting a division of the hair: or it may be rendered, "take thee a sharp knife, even take "thee a barber's razor;" the former may be understood of any sort of sharp instrument, the latter describing the kind. Jerusalem had been the head of the nation of Israel, and the most favoured city upon earth: her numerous inhabitants were her ornament and strength, as the hair is the ornament of the head, and the beard is the token of manhood. But the city was to be desolated and levelled with the ground; as the head is bared when the hair and beard are shaven off. Then her ornament and strength were taken away: and as the shaving of the Nazarite disannulled his vow; so perhaps this indicated that the token of her consecration to God was destroyed by her sins. This showed the severity of the judgments of God: and the weighing of the hair intimated the strict justice and exactness of the divine proceedings. The three parts of the hair, and the different modes of disposing of them, represented the wisdom, in which the inhabitants of Jerusalem were consigned to their several punishments. The third part of the hair, which was burned with fire in the midst of the city, (that is, the picture of the city before mentioned,) at the end of the siege, (or the days which the prophet lay before it,) (Notes, iv.) denoted, that a third part of the Jews, who had taken refuge in Jerusalem, would perish by famine, pestilence, or conflagrations, during the siege, or when it was terminated: the third part, smitten with a knife or sword, represented those who were slain by the besiegers in attempting to escape: and the third part scattered in the wind, represented those who fled, or were carried captives into other countries; who would be pursued by the justice of God and the cruelty of their enemies, into every place. A few hairs which the prophet bound in his skirts, as if they were to be preserved, of which some were afterwards cast into the fire, signified the remnant, who were left in the land under Gedaliah, and seemed to have acquired a settlement; till the murder of Gedaliah, and the flight of the rest into Egypt, overturned the whole design. Most of them perished miserably: and the Chaldeans, exasperated by their defection to the Egyptians, seem to have treated the other Jews with greater severity on their account, and to have utterly desolated the land.—'Marmonides observes, that the priests were forbidden 'to shave their heads, in the time of mourning, from 'whence he concludes that this was performed only in 'vision. But there is no need of such an evasion to 'answer the difficulty; for the immediate command of 'God to any prophet, is a sufficient discharge from any 'obligations of the ceremonial law. So Elijah offered sa'crifice on mount Carmel, contrary to the rule of the law.' (Deut. xii. 5. 1 Kings xviii. 20.) (Lowth.)

9 And I will do in thee [r] that which I have not done, and whereunto I will not do any more the like, because of all thine abominations.

10 Therefore [s] the fathers shall eat the sons in the midst of thee, and the sons shall eat their fathers; and I will execute judgments in thee, and [t] the whole remnant of thee will I scatter into all the winds.

11 Wherefore, [u] as I live, saith the Lord GOD; Surely, because [x] thou hast defiled my sanctuary with all thy [y] detestable things, and with all thine abominations, therefore [z] will I also diminish thee; [a] neither shall mine eye spare, neither will I have any pity.

12 A [b] third part of thee shall die with the pestilence, and with famine shall they be consumed in the midst of thee; and a third part shall fall by the sword round about thee; [c] and I will scatter a third part into all the winds; [d] and I will draw out a sword after them.

13 Thus [e] shall mine anger be accomplished, and [f] I will cause my fury to rest upon them, [g] and I will be comforted: and they shall know that I the LORD have [h] spoken it in my zeal, when I have accomplished my fury in them.

14 Moreover [i] I will make thee waste, and a reproach among [k] the nations that are round about thee, in the sight of all that pass by.

15 So it shall be a reproach and a taunt, [l] an instruction, and an astonishment unto the nations that are round about thee, [m] when I shall execute judgments in thee in anger, and in fury, and in furious rebukes. I the LORD have spoken it.

16 When I shall send upon them [n] the evil arrows of famine, which shall be for their destruction, and which I will send to destroy you: and I will increase the famine upon you, [o] and will break your staff of bread.

17 So will I send upon you famine, [p] and evil beasts, and they shall bereave thee; [q] and pestilence and blood shall pass through thee; [r] and I will bring the sword upon thee. [s] I the LORD have spoken it.

V. 5—10. The Lord here explained this sign, to be, (that is, to represent,) Jerusalem. He had placed that city in the midst of the most populous and prosperous nations then on earth, as the place of his temple, and the centre of his worship; that his perfections, truths, laws, and ordinances, might be known to others, for the glory of his name. Thus she was as the head among the cities and nations of the earth. 'It was a city set on a hill, on 'purpose that it might be a pattern of religion and virtue 'to them.' (Lowth.) But the inhabitants of this favoured city had abused the ordinances of God, as the cloak or occasion of their sins: they had changed the glorious object of their worship for the most worthless idols and superstitions; they went further from his statutes, and more multiplied their abominations, than the Gentiles themselves: they were not content with copying the judgments, the rites, customs, or worship, of any one heathen nation: but they collected from them all, and improved upon them all! And as they thus dishonoured God among the heathen, he determined to vindicate his insulted honour in their sight, by executing vengeance upon the Jews with a severity as unexampled as their guilt. Insomuch, that in the extremity of famine they should eat one another; even parents should eat the flesh of their children, and children of their parents, without any distinction; whilst the wretched remnant of them would be dispersed into every part of the earth. The destruction of Jerusalem, and the captivity of its inhabitants by the Chaldeans, were primarily intended: and yet the desolations and dispersions afterwards caused by the Romans formed a still more awful accomplishment of the prophecy. (Marg. Ref.) —Multiplied. 'Your idols are in greater number, and 'your superstitions more than among professed idolaters.'

—Scatter. 'This is another judgment threatened against 'them by Moses, and remarkably fulfilled in their last 'dispersion, when every part of the world hath some share 'of them, and yet they live every where like strangers, 'only upon sufferance.' (Lowth.)

V. 11, 12. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 13. Comforted, &c. Such expressions are used in accommodation to our apprehensions. If a man has been greatly injured and dishonoured, he is comforted when he obtains satisfaction for the injury, and can wipe away the disgrace. The Jews had greatly dishonoured God, and caused the heathen to blaspheme his holy religion; but his judgments executed on them manifested his power, justice, holiness, and truth; stopped the mouths of blasphemers; and reflected honour on his law and worship. Such "ven-" geance belongeth unto God;" and he was determined not to rest, till he had satisfied his justice, and glorified his name, in their condign punishment; and in this he would take pleasure. For though he delights not in the death of a sinner; yet he delights in acting in a manner worthy of himself, even in taking vengeance on incorrigible rebels. This sentence he had denounced in his zeal for his own glory; and he would accomplish it, in most tremendous vengeance upon the Jews.

V. 14—17. (Marg. Ref.) The event would show, that God had denounced these tremendous judgments, from a due regard to the honour of his own name, which would also assuredly induce him to accomplish them in the most awful manner.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is so difficult to make men sensible of their guilt and danger, that we should employ for this purpose every expedient, argument, or illustration, that we can devise. The severest vengeance of God is regulated by the most perfect wisdom and justice: every distinction, when abused, increases guilt and condemnation: and to whatever refuge sinners flee, the fire and sword of the Lord's indignation will overtake them. The professors of Christianity are as a city on a hill, in the midst of the nations of the earth; their conduct cannot be hid. If it consist with their holy profession, God will be glorified, his truths and worship recommended, and a blessing through them communicated to mankind. But, alas! too many of them are the vilest of men: they depart from God's judgments and statutes more than the blind Pagans; they turn his grace into licentiousness, and exceed in fraud, oppression, cruelty, impiety, and iniquity, the worst of the idolaters, among whom they disgrace the Christian name. But let such persons read, in the temporal judgments executed on the Jewish nation, the awful sentence which will be denounced against them in the day of wrath, when God shall deal with them according to their abominations. However he may now spare guilty nations or individuals, he will then have no pity on those who have defiled his sanctuary, and disgraced his Gospel, with their detestable things. Nor will he rest or be comforted respecting them, till by their condign punishment he have wiped off the dishonour, which their crimes have cast upon his name and cause; and until he have satisfied his justice, in executing the most dreadful denunciations which he hath spoken in his zeal. Nor let those churches who have changed, or made of none effect, his judgments and statutes, that they might observe their own traditions, and maintain their detestable idolatries and superstitions, expect to escape the doom of Jerusalem. By sore judgments will the Lord plead against them, and make them a reproach, a taunt, an instruction, and an astonishment: for he hath spoken, and all shall know his truth in the accomplishment of his word. But let us be instructed by such examples and warnings; let us entreat the Lord to glorify himself in our salvation; and let us endeavour to "adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour "in all things." Then will he rejoice over us to do us good; all his promises will belong to us, all his perfections be engaged for our salvation; and only with our eyes shall we behold, and see the destruction of the wicked.

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 2, 3. The mountains in the land of Israel, or the whole land of promise, had been polluted with the idolatries of the people: the prophet was therefore ordered to look towards them, and address his predictions to them, as if present, and capable of hearing his word: but the hills and valleys, and other parts of the country, were concerned in it. This was a rebuke of the stupidity of the people; and intimated, that the Chaldeans would shortly desolate the whole land of Judah, as the Assyrians had done that of Israel.

V. 4. 'This verse is plainly taken from Lev. xxvi. 30. 'The word Hamannim, images, is generally supposed to mean such as were erected to the honour of the sun.' (Lowth.) The peculiar, and, as it might previously have been thought, unlikely event, of the Babylonish captivity, in entirely terminating gross idolatries in Canaan, and among such Jews or Israelites as were not incorporated with the Gentiles, is here emphatically predicted.

V. 7. 'The judgments God intended to bring on the Jews, would make the most hardened and stupid sinners sinsible, that this was his hand.' (Lowth.)

8 Yet [o] will I leave a remnant, that ye may have some that shall escape the sword among the nations, when ye shall be scattered through the countries.

9 And they that escape of you shall [p] remember me among the nations, whither they shall be carried captives, because [q] I am broken with their whorish heart, which hath departed from me, and with [r] their eyes, which go a whoring after their idols: [s] and they shall loathe themselves for the evils, which they have committed in all their abominations.

10 And [t] they shall know that I am the LORD, and that I have not said in vain that I would do this evil unto them.

11 ¶ Thus saith the Lord GOD, [u] Smite with thine hand, and stamp with thy foot, and say, [x] Alas, for all the evil abominations of the house of Israel! for they shall [y] fall by the sword, by the famine, and by the pestilence.

12 He that is [z] far off shall die of the pestilence; and he that is near shall fall by the sword; and he that remaineth, and is besieged, shall die by the famine: [a] thus will I accomplish my fury upon them.

13 Then shall ye know that I am the LORD, [b] when their slain men shall be among their idols round about their altars, [c] upon every high hill, in all the tops of the mountains, and under every green tree, and under every thick oak, the place where they did offer sweet savour to all their idols.

14 So [d] will I stretch out my hand upon them, and make the land desolate, yea, * more desolate than the wilderness toward [e] Diblath, in all their habitations: and they shall know that I am the LORD.

V. 8—10. The Lord did not intend that the nation of Israel should be utterly destroyed by these judgments. A small remnant should be reserved in mercy, though all deserved to perish: these should escape the sword that would be drawn out after the captives; and at length be led to remember the Lord, and their obligations to him and rebellion against him. They would then recollect their proneness to idolatry from age to age, by which they had wearied out his patience and goodness; even as a beloved wife breaks the heart of her husband by her continual adulteries, and by showing a disposition to prefer every man she looks on to him. Thus they would learn to abhor themselves, and would become loathsome in their own sight, when they reflected on their own base and ungrateful conduct towards the Lord, who had so greatly favoured them: and they would know his power, truth, and justice, in the execution of the predicted evils upon them; and would confess, that they were not vain words, as they had once thought them, nor pronounced without cause; but that they deserved all that they endured. Then they would fear God, forsake all idolatry, and return to his worship and service.

V. 11. The exceeding wickedness and insensibility of the Jews, and the terrible calamities coming upon them, required that the prophet should express his concern in the most emphatical manner: he was therefore directed, as one carried away with the earnestness and vehemency of his mind, to smite with his hand and to stamp with his foot; whilst he exclaimed against the abominations of the people, and denounced the judgments of God upon them. This might give many of them an occasion to revile or ridicule him, as enraged, or beside himself: but it might also tend to awaken some of them to a serious consideration of the predictions, which he delivered with so much earnestness.

V. 14. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Whatever men idolize or abuse to sin, will tend to their hurt, or be involved in their ruin; and they who hate the knowledge of God, through love of sin, shall be made to know him by experiencing the power of his wrath. The superstitions that many trust to for safety, often prove the immediate cause of their ruin: and it is as awful for a sinner to be cut off in the act of worshipping an image or a creature, as in the practice of the grossest immorality; for the Lord is a jealous God, and will not give his glory to another. However poor benighted Pagans may be spared in their idolatries, if the mountains of Israel, the countries favoured with the oracles of God, become the receptacle of such abominations, they may expect his severest vengeance: and it will not be long before idols and idolatry will be as awfully and effectually destroyed out of the Christian Church, as they were from among the Jews.—Men's wickedness springs from forgetfulness of God, and disregard to their relations and obligations to him. Whatever therefore brings them to remember him, and their sins, should be considered as a blessing. True repentance springs from the knowledge of God and of ourselves: this shows the evil and malignity of our transgressions, the depraved propensity of our hearts to depart from him; and the innumerable provocations committed against him, in our thoughts, words, and works, by all our faculties and senses, our bodies and souls. Then we perceive how much we have done to abuse his goodness, weary out his patience, and violate our engagements and obligations to him; our self-justification and self-admiration will be turned into humble confessions of guilt and self-abhorrence before God; and this will lead us to hope only in his mercy, to acknowledge his truth and justice in all our corrections, and to return to his service with uprightness of heart, renouncing all our formerly beloved, but now loathed, idolatries and iniquities. But men are generally far from this penitent frame of mind; they cavil at the threatenings of Scripture as severe or unjust, or they disregard them as vain words: and are secure and confident upon the brink of destruction. It therefore behooves such of us as are called to preach the word of God, to speak and act as men in earnest, who are deeply affected with abhorrence of the sins against which we protest, and with compassion for those against whom we denounce the vengeance of God. This vehemency of language and gesture will excite the disgust, the ridicule, or the rage, of proud and carnal men, and expose us to contempt and calumny: but if we know the worth of souls, and the danger to which unbelievers are exposed, we shall deem every sinner, who takes warning to flee to Jesus for deliverance from the wrath to come, an abundant recompense for the derision and obloquy that we meet with from thousands, who are thronging the broad road to destruction; and who will be soon convinced, that no earnestness could be too great in such a cause.

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 2. The abrupt manner, and the many repetitions, of this prophecy, showed that the prophet was greatly affected by the prospect of the calamities that he predicted: as men cry, Fire, fire! Thieves, thieves! when they or others are in imminent danger. The Lord had long spared the people, or only inflicted partial judgments: but the end was now come to their establishment and prosperity; and his vengeance would desolate the four corners of the land, including Israel as well as Judah. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4. In the midst, &c. The dire consequences of Israel's abominable idolatries and iniquities would be manifest in those very places where their crimes had been committed. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5. An only, &c. 'That evil is come upon thee 'which alone shall make a dispatch of thee; there will 'need no other to second it.' (Bp. Hall.) 'Such an 'evil, as shall comprehend all other calamities in it.' (Lowth.) An unprecedented evil, of itself sufficient to ruin the nation. (1 Sam. xxvi. 8.) This was come, or near at hand: for the prediction seems to have been delivered about three years before Jerusalem was besieged.

V. 6. (Note, 2.) 'A destruction, which shall be fatal 'to a great part of those that go into captivity; as well 'as to those who are consumed in their own country.' (Lowth.)

V. 7. The predicted day of vengeance, which watched for the Jews, was at hand: the day dawned, the tokens of approaching ruin were discernible: the report of the Chaldean invasion was no vain rumour; not like the echo or reverberated sound upon the mountains, by which a single voice might be mistaken for the noise of a multitude; for the Chaldean army was indeed upon the march, and would soon arrive and bring destruction with them. 'The 'Hebrew word properly signifies such a joyful sound as 'used to echo from the mountains, by which the treaders 'of the grapes expressed their satisfaction, at the time of 'vintage.' (Lowth.)

V. 10, 11. The rod, or sceptre, of authority among the Jews had budded into pride, ambition, and tyranny, and blossomed into violence and oppression; and these produced such an increase of wickedness, as brought down the judgments of God upon them. Or Nebuchadnezzar, his rod of correction was grown exceedingly in power, pride, violence, and rapacity; and thus was prepared to punish the Jews; and their pride, violence, and iniquity, exposed them to this prosperous scourge of God. So that nothing would remain in Judah, or Jerusalem, of all their multitude and riches; nor any to lament those that were slain or carried captive. The word translated any of theirs, is by some supposed to mean, their boasters, or tumultuous ones.

V. 12, 13. In general men think they have reason to rejoice, if they are able to buy estates; and to lament, if obliged to sell their houses and lands: but this would by no means be the case of the Jews at that time; for the buyer would soon be driven from his purchased possession; and the seller would only part with what must in a very short time have been torn from him. For the wrath of God against the whole multitude would soon desolate the land: and even they that should survive these calamities, would not be able to return to their possessions at the year of Jubilee, being detained captive at Babylon. None of them would return, till the seventy years of the captivity were accomplished; and then many of them would not be able to claim and obtain possession of their inheritances: and in vain did any of them expect deliverance by their power or courage, whilst they hardened themselves in sin.

V. 14. In defiance of these warnings and predictions, the leaders of the Jews caused the trumpet of war to be sounded, to make all ready to withstand the invaders: but they found the people deprived of all courage and resolution; because God in his wrath had intimidated them.

V. 15. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 16—19. A small remnant would escape death by the sword, famine, and pestilence; but they would be driven out of the land, and scattered abroad as lost sheep upon the mountains: and there they would mourn for their sins, and the calamities occasioned by them; as doves of the valleys, (or tame doves,) which are driven to the mountains by the birds of prey, and there mourn their separation from their mates, in the most disconsolate manner. Dejection of spirits would enfeeble the hands of this remnant, and render their knees weak as water, or enervate all their attempts to resist or escape their enemies: and they would express their grief and horror of mind, and their confusion and shame, by every customary token. Then would they find the inefficacy of their silver and gold to purchase them bread, to preserve their lives, to give comfort to their desponding hearts, or to deliver them from the wrath of God and the executioners of his vengeance: and therefore, though they had before covetously idolized their riches, and the love of them had been the stumbling-block over which they had fallen into manifold impieties and iniquities, which had exposed them to these calamities; yet they would then cast them into the streets, or leave them without concern to be rifled and removed by the victors, and even count them vile and polluted. For they had got them by injustice, hoarded them in avarice, and employed them in luxury, or in supporting idolatry, in making idols and adorning their temples. (Marg. Ref.)—'Some few of them shall have the favour of escaping the 'common calamity, called elsewhere the escaped or the 'remnant; from whence is derived the phrase, οἱ σωζόμενοι, 'in the New Testament; such as are, or should be saved.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

21 And [u] I will give it into the hands of the strangers for a prey, and to the wicked of the earth for a spoil; and they shall pollute it.

22 My [x] face will I turn also from them, and they shall pollute my secret place: for the * robbers shall enter into it, and defile it.

23 ¶ Make [y] a chain: [z] for the land is full of bloody crimes, and the city is full of violence.

24 Wherefore [a] I will bring the worst of the heathen, [b] and they shall possess their houses: [c] I will also make the pomp of the strong to cease, and † their holy places shall be defiled.

25 ‡ Destruction cometh; [d] and they shall seek peace, and there shall be none.

26 [e] Mischief shall come upon mischief, and rumour shall be upon rumour; [f] then shall they seek a vision of the prophet: [g] but the law shall perish from the priest, and counsel from the [h] ancients.

27 The [i] king shall mourn, and the prince shall be clothed with desolation, and the hands of the people of the land shall be troubled: [k] I will do unto them after their way, and [j] according to their deserts will I judge them; [l] and they shall know that I am the LORD.

V. 20—22. The temple had been the chief beauty and ornament of Jerusalem. Solomon had builded and decorated it with vast magnificence; many of his successors had expended large sums in repairing and beautifying it; God had greatly honoured it, as the place in which he displayed his glory; and the people were vain of it and confided in it. But, as they had defiled the courts of it, and even the sanctuary itself, by their detestable idols, the Lord determined to remove them far from it into captivity; or to make it as an unclean thing, being defiled by the presence of the Chaldeans, and by the slaughter there committed. These most wicked and impious strangers would be allowed to rifle its sacred treasures: nay, the Lord would turn away his face, as one who utterly disregarded what was doing, whilst they entered the holy of holies, his secret place, plundered it of the mercy-seat and the ark of the covenant, and utterly profaned and destroyed it. This is the general, and probably the true, interpretation, (Marg. Ref.) but the Septuagint connects the passage with the nineteenth verse, and renders the twentieth as follows. 'They were proud of their chosen ornaments, 'and made of them the images of their abominations; 'therefore I have given them up to be polluted,' &c.

V. 23. This commandment to make a chain implied, that the Jews, as condemned criminals, would be delivered up into the hands of their enemies, and be led away captive and in chains, and cast into prison. "Bloody "crimes" were either such as were punishable by the death of the criminals; or rather those of the oppressors and persecutors, that had filled Jerusalem with innocent blood. The original is, the judgment of bloods; unjust decisions of the magistrates, by which the innocent were put to death.

V. 24. Pomp of, &c. That is, the magnificence of their greatest and haughtiest princes.

V. 26. When one calamity should succeed to another, and alarming rumours be continually propagated, the people would not be able to obtain information from the prophets; nor would the priests be able to give them instruction or consolation; and their elders and counsellors would be confounded and infatuated. This related to the case of the Jews during the invasion of the land, and the siege of the city; and afterwards during the Babylonish captivity: but it still more emphatically corresponds with the condition of that nation, from the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans to this present day.

V. 27. 'There shall be a general consternation of all 'ranks and degrees of men. Those in authority shall 'want presence of mind to give counsel and directions; 'and their inferiors shall have no heart to carry them into 'execution.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15.

An end will soon come to all the prosperity and enjoyment of impenitent sinners, in every corner of the earth. Now is the day of the Lord's patience and mercy: but the day is at hand, when he will send his anger upon ungodly men, and judge and recompense them according to their ways, without mercy or pity: then they that are filthy will continue filthy still, and their abominations shall be in the midst of them for ever. This destruction is indeed an evil, an only evil, a natural evil, of magnitude proportioned to the moral evil and desert of sin: and all other sufferings may be deemed trivial and scarcely worth notice, when compared with it. We should therefore loudly sound the alarm, and strenuously and earnestly call on men "to flee "from the wrath to come." For this misery continually overtaketh one and another of the ungodly, and it watcheth for every one of them. The morning of our dying day, and of the day of judgment, will soon dawn: the time of the sinner's trouble is at hand; and they, who have treated all the warnings of God's word and providence as false alarms, will find them awfully realized; and no more consider them as the sounding of the mountains. What then will they think of their presumptuous delays and carnal security, when the day of life and of grace shall expire? when the anger of God shall be accomplished on them, when vain mirth, self-flattery, and false hope, shall terminate in weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth! Indeed, whilst men are indulging their pride and lusts, and these are budding, blossoming, and bringing forth fruit

The prophet is, in vision, brought to Jerusalem and to the temple, 1—4. He sees the image of Jealousy by the gate of the altar; the elders of Israel worshipping base idols in a secret chamber of the temple; women weeping for Tammuz, and men with their backs to the temple worshipping the sun, 5—16. unto death, the instruments of vengeance are also preparing: and thus sudden destruction cometh, from which there is no escape. Though we should continue to be favoured with national peace and temporal prosperity, yet how soon will the time arrive, when all our joys and sorrows about worldly gain and loss will be no more! The fashion of this world passeth away, and all our eagerness and anxiety about it are vain and useless. The wrath of God hath filled the earth with trouble and death: men must soon be torn from their possessions, to return no more to them: and how wretched must they be, who have no inheritance in that world, to which we are all hastening, and from which there is no return! nor can any man strengthen himself in iniquity, so as to outbrave these tremendous evils.

V. 16—27.

All efforts to outbrave or elude divine vengeance, in this world or in the next, must be unavailing: the wrath of God dismays the most intrepid; their hands hang down and their knees wax feeble, and inward horror accompanies their outward calamities and confusion. And if, in the siege and taking of cities, men cast away their gold and silver, as an encumbrance rather than a security, what judgment will sinners form of their value, in the final day of wrath and perdition of ungodly men? Even here they can neither comfort the wounded heart, nor ease the burdened conscience, nor purchase health and ease; and in some cases they will not even procure food to satisfy the hunger of their famished possessors. Yet, after all that can be said, men will set their hearts on such lying vanities; and multiply crimes, and treasure up wrath, remorse, and horror, in order to increase such riches as will yield no comfort when they most want it, and which must be left for ever! Even in religion human folly and depravity are equally conspicuous: men value themselves on distinctions and forms, which they disgrace by their crimes, and which must finally increase their condemnation! But whatever supposed decency, beauty, or majesty, there may be in our modes of worship, God will deem them polluted to all such as make them the cloak of their iniquities: and he hath often permitted the most impious, rapacious, and cruel, of the nations to plunder and waste those professing churches, which have dishonoured him by their crimes. In vain do they seek peace or deliverance from their enemies, if unrepented sins exclude them from the peace and protection of God. Mischief must at length come upon mischief, and rumour upon rumour; whilst neither prophet, priest, counsellor, nor prince can escape, or show others any way of deliverance. For they who will not mourn for sin with godly sorrow, must bewail its effects with bitter lamentations, being covered with confusion and clothed with desolation. To this awful ruin the whole multitude of the human species is exposed; yet "a remnant according to the election of grace" shall escape. These may be known by their mourning for sin, with broken hearts and penitent confessions, like doves of the valleys; and by becoming harmless, pure, gentle, modest, and loving, according to that instructive emblem. Such penitents shall obtain pardon and peace by faith in Jesus Christ, and those riches, which will give comfort in the hour of death, and profit them in the day of wrath. May the Lord incline and enable us to choose and seek this good part, that shall never be taken from us!

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1. Only fourteen months, or four hundred and twenty days, seem to have passed from Ezekiel's first vision to the date of this chapter, (i. 2.) which would not allow time for his lying three hundred and ninety days on his left side, and forty on his right side, according to the interpretation given of that transaction, (Notes, iv.) But this might be their leap-year, to which a full month of thirty days was added, as it is well known: or this transaction might take place after the expiration of three hundred and ninety days, and before the forty days were entered on. At the time here mentioned, the prophet was sitting in his house, and was attended by some of the elders of Judah that were in captivity: perhaps it was the sabbath day, and they came to attend his instructions, as they had neither temple nor synagogue to resort to; or they came to consult him about some of their affairs. Whilst they were present, he was seized by a powerful divine impulse, and cast into an ecstacy or trance, and had the following vision presented to his mind.

rusalem, [z] to the door of the inner gate that looketh toward the north; where was the seat of [h] the image of jealousy, which [i] provoketh to jealousy.

4 And, behold, [k] the glory of the God of Israel was there, according to the vision that I saw in the plain.

5 Then said he unto me, Son of man, [l] lift up thine eyes now the way toward the north. So I lifted up mine eyes the way toward the north, and behold, northward [m] at the gate of the altar, this image of jealousy in the entry!

6 He said furthermore unto me, Son of man, [n] seest thou what they do? [o] even the great abominations that the house of Israel committeth here, [p] that I should go far off from my sanctuary? but turn thee yet again, and thou shalt see [q] greater abominations.

7 ¶ And he brought me to [r] the door of the court; and when I looked, behold, a hole in the wall.

8 Then said he unto me, Son of man, [s] dig now in the wall: and when I had digged in the wall, behold a door.

9 And he said unto me, Go in, and behold the wicked abominations that they do here.

10 So I went in and saw; and behold, [t] every form of creeping things, and abominable beasts, and all the idols of the house of Israel, pourtrayed upon the wall round about.

11 And there stood before them [u] seventy men of the ancients of the house of Israel, and in the midst of them stood Jaazaniah the son of [x] Shaphan, with [y] every man his censer in his hand; and a thick cloud of incense went up.

12 Then said he unto me, Son of man, [z] hast thou seen what the [a] ancients of the house of Israel do [b] in the dark, every man in the chambers of his imagery? for they say, [c] The LORD seeth us not; the LORD hath forsaken the earth.

V. 2—4. (Note, i. 26—28.) Doubtless this was the same appearance that Ezekiel had before seen: "a likeness," that is, of a man upon a throne, "as the appearance of fire downwards," denoting the terrible and righteous indignation of God against the rebellious Jews; and as of brightness and of the colour of amber upward, perhaps implying the essential glory and excellency of the eternal Son of God, as they appear to the inhabitants of heaven. This glorious person seemed, in vision, to put forth the form of a hand, and to take hold of a lock of the prophet's hair; and at the same time the Spirit lifted him up in the vision of God, and conveyed him to Jerusalem, to the entrance of the inner court of the temple from the north, by that gate which was called the altar-gate. There was a seat or niche, prepared for some base idol, perhaps Baal, or Molech, which was called the image of jealousy; because the open worship of this idol provoked the Lord to jealousy; even as the open adultery of a woman, in the house of her husband, would excite his jealousy. At the same time the glory of the Lord, according to what the prophet had formerly seen in the plain, appeared to him; which intimated that JEHOVAH had not yet withdrawn his presence from his temple, though he had been treated with such contempt by the open preference given by the Jews to a base idol. The whole was presented in vision before the prophet's mind, whilst he continued in his own house: but doubtless it was an exact discovery of the idolatries committed at the temple; and it was intended to show the justice of the predicted vengeance, and to represent the reason and manner of the Lord's departure from his professed worshippers.

V. 6. That I, &c. The detestable idolatries, committed even at the temple of God, would constrain him to leave it and the people to the merciless ravages of their enemies. He could not consistently with his honour dwell any longer in his polluted sanctuary, or among such vile idolaters. They acted as if they had determined to exclude him from his temple, and drive him from among them: for the injured husband must put his wife away, when her adulteries become notorious and abandoned; or else his own reputation will suffer. But as if this one image, openly worshipped in the court of the temple, had been a small matter; the prophet was ordered to turn his eyes another way, and he would discover still more and greater abominations.

V. 7—12. When the prophet had been conducted to some door of the court of the temple, he found a wall, which seems to have been built in order to conceal the idolatries, secretly practised by the elders in the chambers of the temple, which had been converted into a sort of chapel, for that purpose. But when he had examined this wall, he discovered a hole: and being ordered to dig, or to work at it to make it larger, he found a door that had been walled up; by which he was commanded to enter. There he saw all kinds of reptiles and unclean beasts, such as the Egyptians used to worship; and all the idols, that Israel or Judah had ever worshipped, painted all around upon the wall: and before them seventy men of the elders of Israel, (according to the number of the sanhedrim, or great council of the nation,) were collected together. One of them he knew to be Jaazaniah, (who perhaps was president of the council, or a very eminent man among them,) and there were they, as consecrated priests of this rabble of dunghill-gods, every man with his censer in his hand, lavish by burning incense and presenting their adorations. This indeed was shown to the prophet in a vision; but such was the actual conduct of the rulers and elders of Judah, in their dark recesses in the chambers of the temple, which they secretly appropriated to their images; and, as some think, in the private chambers of their own houses also. For they concluded, that the Lord did not see them, and that he had forsaken the earth, or the land. He did not deliver the people out of their difficulties; because they continued in sin, and had not sought him with sincere repentance, faith, and prayer, but merely in hypocrisy: and they concluded that he either could not, or would not, help them; and that they were authorized to seek help from some other quarter, as Saul did, to his own destruction. Nay, they seem to have questioned the existence, or the omnipresence and omniscience, of JEHOVAH: they concluded that no good would come from waiting on him, nor any harm from forsaking him: and they determined to seek help from those idols, whose licentious characters and worship they loved, in proportion as they hated the holy character, worship, and service of God.

V. 14. Weeping, &c. It is not agreed who or what Tammuz was, or on what account this idolatrous ceremony was observed in honour of him. But it is generally allowed, that he was some very profligate man, who was deified after his death; and that this annual lamentation for him was attended with the most infamous licentiousness: and, concerning such an union of impiety and immorality, the less we know the better.

V. 15. Greater, &c. Some learned men observe, that this expression may be rendered "great abominations be-"sides these." And indeed we can scarcely conceive greater abominations, than those before mentioned.

V. 16. These twenty-five men are supposed to have been priests, who turned their backs on the temple of God to worship the rising sun! The Holy of Holies was at the west end of the sanctuary, and that was westward of the altar: so that they could not worship the sun with their faces to the east, without turning their backs on the Lord and his holy place. We cannot doubt but that the practice of turning to the east in some parts of public worship, which is still retained in many Christian Churches, was originally borrowed from idolaters, who worshipped the sun: and though it is possible for us to be superstitiously afraid of superstition, respecting any indifferent posture or ceremony, yet they, who are very tenacious of this custom, would do well to consider its original, in order to abate their excessive attachment to it.

V. 17. They have, &c. The Jews were not only guilty of these idolatries, but also of oppression and injustice equally atrocious. Thus they used every means to provoke the Lord to anger. Whether the expression, "They put the branch to their nose," refers to some idolatrous practice, or to some methods then in use, by which men endeavoured to exasperate others, and to show their contempt and defiance of them, is not certain. The Septuagint renders it, "They are as those that mock me." 'They add more fuel to my wrath, which will burst out 'as a flame to consume them; just as if one should lay a 'heap of dry sticks upon a fire.' (Lightfoot in Lowth.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—6.

The wrath of God, revealed from heaven against sinners, appears rigorous and extreme, in proportion as men are ignorant of his perfections, of the evil of sin, and of the abominations that are every where committed. If it should please God to give any man a very clear view of his glorious majesty and authority, and of the evil that is in every act of rebellion against him; and should at once present before him, in vision, all the abominations that are continually committing in any one city; there can be little doubt but he would be prepared to justify God in the severest vengeance which he could inflict upon it. But though we are not thus acquainted with all the wickedness which is present to his all-seeing eye, yet, if we carefully search the Scriptures, and compare with them all that we can recollect and are conscious of, in our own thoughts, words, and works; if we carefully watch our own hearts and experience; and if we diligently observe the conduct of the world around us, we shall entertain far more affecting views of human depravity, and of the justice of God in his temporal and eternal judgments, than we used to do; we shall learn to drop our objections, silently to submit to his righteousness, and patiently to wait for that day, when he will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and show the reasons of all his dispensations: and this will make us thankful, that there is forgiveness with him, and plenteous redemption for hell-deserving sinners. The carelessness with which men provoke God, and prefer every worthless idol and base lust to his favour and service, sufficiently mark the apostacy, rebellion, ingratitude, and enmity of the human heart; but generally the nearer we come to the sanctuary, the viler iniquities we discover, by diligent investigation. It would peculiarly astonish and shock a pious mind, to be shown all the abominations which have been committed by the professed patrons of religion, in every part of the world. The superstition and idolatry, the blasphemous pride and ambition, the fraud and imposture, the avarice, perjury, persecution, cruelty, and licentiousness, by which the Lord hath been provoked to jealousy, as it were, in the inner court of the temple, have in too many instances been notorious to all the world. And thus many churches have provoked the Lord to forsake them, as he repeatedly did his temple at Jerusalem.

V. 7—18.

The abominations, which all men see and cry shame of, are not always the worst, and seldom the whole, that provokes the Lord to jealousy: sometimes still more horrid things are done in secret by those who "love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil." Such persons either forget or atheistically deny that the Lord seeth them; and act as if he had forsaken the earth. But he will detect their hypocrisy; and after all their care to conceal their crimes, they commonly leave some opening which leads to a discovery. No superiority in rank, dignity, learning, or worldly wisdom, no sacredness of character and office, will preserve men from the most grovelling lusts, or even from the most stupid idolatries, when they are left to their own deceitful hearts: nay, superior persons are commonly the ringleaders and examples of every abomination to their inferiors, who follow them at an humble distance. They, who grudge all expenses, and are soon wearied out in the spiritual service of God, and who deem themselves degraded by it, often grudge no expense, labour, or debasement, in following their own idolatries and superstitions. For true religion is contrary to their pride and lusts; but their own inventions consist with the indulgence of their several inclinations: and therefore we need not wonder, that they turn their backs on God's service, to keep human traditions, or "turn away their "ears from the truth, and are turned unto fables." Thus idolatry and false religion, as well as impiety, connect with violence, oppression, and immorality. Therefore the Lord will deal with them in fury and without pity: and all his judgments on nations and churches are only earnests of his final wrath on the workers of iniquity; when they will indeed cry unto him with a loud voice, but he will not hear them; and when they will plainly appear to have merited their dreadful condemnation. For if some, who make a fair show in the house of God, could be followed to their secret chambers, they would be found committing the most abominable crimes: many, whose exterior is decent, have the chambers of their imagination continually occupied by licentious thoughts, in which they delight, and thus gratify their hateful passions with ideal indulgences: many who have for a time been restrained by natural modesty and regard to character, have afterwards shown their secret inclinations; when, occasion being given them, they have run into the greatest excesses. In short, the more we know of ourselves and of human nature, the more and greater abominations shall we discover: and the longer the enlightened believer, (who is enabled to walk most uprightly before God, and most blamelessly before men,) examines himself and searches his heart, the more will he loathe and humble himself before God; and the more will he value and daily wash in the Fountain opened for sin and for uncleanness. Thus shall he be made whiter than snow: but how will they escape, who live and die neglecting this great salvation?

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1, 2. The same person, who before appeared in vision and spake to the prophet, here cried with a loud voice to those that had the charge of the city, to draw near. Accordingly six men came into the city from the north, with each a destroying weapon in his hand. Some understand, by these six persons, the angels, who before had been employed to protect Jerusalem, and were now commissioned to be her destroyers. But as there was no miraculous interposition in these divine judgments, it seems more obvious to consider them as representing the Chaldean army, or its six chief captains, who had a charge or commission against Jerusalem. With them there appeared one clothed with linen, the attire of a priest and not of a soldier, with an inkhorn by his side. Many interpreters explain this to mean Christ, our High Priest and King, who presides over all the desolations on earth, in order to preserve his chosen people; and who seals them by his Spirit, and writes their names in his book of life. But if this were the Word, and Son of God, what shall we make of the likeness of a man upon the throne, from whence these orders were issued? It seems therefore more agreeable to the context to suppose that Christ the King of Israel, from the throne, gave these orders; and that the man with the inkhorn represented an angel, or the angels, that were employed to protect the pious remnant of the Jews from the Chaldeans: and his priestly garment might denote, that their preservation was owing to the priesthood and sacrifice of him that was to come. (Rev. xv. 5, 6.) These persons went into the court of the temple, and stood beside the brazen altar. 'To denote that the men or-'dained to destruction, were offered up as so many sacri-'fices, to make atonement to God's justice.' (xxxix. 17. Is. xxix. 2. xxxiv. 6.) (Lowth.)

V. 3, 4. The glory of the God of Israel, here mentioned, might either be the visible glory, which appeared in the holy of holies, above the ark, between the cherubim, and which the prophet saw removed from that situation to the entrance of the door of the sanctuary: or that glory which he had seen in the visions of God, and which represented that token of the Lord's gracious presence with Israel. 'The word Cherub stands for Cherubim, as x. 2—4.' (Lowth.) This denoted, that the Lord was about to leave his place, his mercy-seat; to denounce judgment on the people as from his tribunal, to withdraw from his temple and Jerusalem, and to leave them to the profanations and ravages of their enemies. From this glory the Lord addressed the man who had the inkhorn, and ordered him to go through the city, and to set a mark upon the forehead of every one, who sighed continually, and earnestly protested against the abominable idolatries and iniquities that were there perpetrated. The forehead seems to have been mentioned, as the most conspicuous place in which a mark could be placed: and it might be supposed, that they who deeply lamented the abominations committed in Jerusalem, to the dishonour of God and ruin of religion, either had not committed such crimes, or had repented of them: they were decidedly on the Lord's part; they would have prevented, by their examples, prayers, and endeavours, the prevalence of wickedness, if they could, and were distressed that they could not. All pious persons at that crisis, no doubt, grieved to see the holy city and temple so horribly polluted. This would therefore take in all who feared God, whatever station they were placed in, or however feeble their gracious dispositions were; and it would exclude all others. 'When the number of such mourners 'is not sufficient to divert God's judgments from a nation, 'they shall at least deliver their own souls.' (Lowth.)

He called to the man. 'The second person in the sa-'cred Trinity gave his commands to the angel before men-'tioned.'

Mark. 'This alludes to the custom of the eastern 'nations, to mark their servants in the forehead.' (Lowth.) A general opinion long prevailed, which the original was thought to favour, that the letter Thau was the mark here intended; and great disputes have taken place, whether in the Samaritan characters, which are supposed to have been at that time used by the Jews, that letter was, or was not, made in the form of a cross. These disputes, however, only show, how early this use of the form of the cross prevailed in the Christian Church, which made way for the superstition and idolatry of the Papists in this particular. It may be supposed, that the vision in the Revelation made to the apostle John had some reference to this of Ezekiel; yet no mention is there made of the form of a cross, which would hardly have been omitted, if it had been used on that occasion. (Rev. vii. 2, 3.) Indeed, it is obvious, that in general the less humble believing regard has been paid to the doctrine of the cross, the greater veneration has been rendered to the external form. This began to be introduced, when the simplicity of the Gospel had become greatly corrupted; it was at its height a short time before the reformation; and began to decline, when the doctrines of the Gospel became more generally understood and believed.

V. 5—7. The Lord next commissioned the executioners of his vengeance to follow the man with the inkhorn, and to slay, without mercy or distinction, even to utter destruction, all they met with: only they might not come near, (either to hurt or affright,) any of those who were marked in the forehead. This foretold the merciless carnage, which the Chaldeans would make of the ungodly Jews; and the gracious protection afforded to the few pious servants of God among them. Thus Jeremiah, Baruch, Ebed-melech, and doubtless others, were preserved. The destroyers were also directed to begin at the sanctuary: and lest they should hesitate to shed blood, and throw the dead carcasses in the courts and sanctuary of God, they were expressly ordered thus to defile them; for this act of signal justice, though a ceremonial defilement, was indeed a moral purification of the temple. Then the prophet saw them begin the slaughter with the elders that were before the house; either the seventy elders whom he had seen burning incense, or the twenty-five men that were worshipping the sun: and then they went forth to make like havock in the city. The reference of the apostle Peter to this passage seems to intimate, that the second destruction of the city and temple by the Romans was also intended by the Spirit of prophecy. (1 Pet. iv. 17, 18.)

V. 8—11. The prophet, in vision, beholding the havock made of his people, whilst he was mercifully spared and left alone, as it seems, of all that were in the court of the temple, was greatly affected; and in humble adoration inquired of the Lord, whether he meant to cut off all the residue of Israel, in thus pouring out his wrath upon Jerusalem? The ten tribes were entirely destroyed or dispersed; only a remnant of Judah remained; and they seemed about to be utterly cut off. By this he intended to plead for a mitigation of the sentence, as the honour of God in his promises seemed to be concerned: but the Lord informed him, that the excessive wickedness of both Judah and Israel rendered this severity needful: the land had been filled with murder, as well as with idolatry; Jerusalem was full of obstinate and perverse wickedness, the fruit of the most desperate impiety and infidelity; and therefore the Lord was determined to show no mercy to the nation in general; though he had reserved a small remnant for himself, as the seed of his future Church. In the mean time the man with the inkhorn reported the performance of the divine command: by which it appears, that he presided over and directed those, who executed the vengeance of God on the Jews.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord hath always ready his instruments of judgment as well as of mercy: and when his glory departs from his people, and his power and presence no longer attend his ordinances, the form will seldom continue long, and the signal for his vengeance will commonly be given. But he departs reluctantly and gradually from those who have been long favoured with his presence; and his faithful servants readily perceive the tokens of that awful change. These are the most valuable friends and guardians of nations: and even when they are so few, that the Lord will not spare communities in answer to their prayers, he will render his most terrible judgments harmless as to them. He has set his mark upon their forehead, and all things shall work together for their good. In times of prevailing wickedness they may be distinguished by their lamenting over those crimes, which others palliate and excuse. Their zeal for the honour and love to the cause of God; their compassion for souls; their hatred of sin and their spiritual-mindedness; will not suffer them to be unconcerned spectators of impiety and iniquity. Their righteous souls must needs be vexed day by day, with seeing and hearing the works and words of ungodly men. Their prayers, examples, and endeavours, are opposed to the impetuous torrent: and when they fail to stop its progress, they are grieved and alarmed. They mourn before God to see religion run down, souls deceived, and Satan and his servants triumphing: and though spiritual consolations reconcile them to their situation for the time, yet they often desire to leave a world, where iniquity so much abounds: and they especially lament the abominations committed within the Church, because these are peculiarly dishonourable to God and destructive to the souls of men. Such persons are the friends of God, and shall be preserved for ever: if it be good for them, their lives shall be spared amidst desolating judgments; or they shall be previously taken from the evil to come; or the calamities, which cut off others in their sins, shall safely transmit their souls to heaven. But they who neither mourn for their own sins nor the sins of others, must expect no mercy: nor can any be looked on as the servants of God, who are indifferent to his cause, and unconcerned at the abominations that are committed against him. In temporal calamities, even infants are often involved in the common destruction: in the eternal punishment of the wicked, no discrimination will be regarded, except with reference to degrees of guilt: and in this respect, they, who have been nearest to God in profession, privilege, or office, will be most severely punished. If we be saved whilst others perish, we must ascribe the difference wholly to the mercy of our God; for we too have deserved wrath: and we should still continue to plead in behalf of our fellow sinners, for the remnant of the Church, and for the continuance and revival of religion upon earth. But indeed the wickedness of man is

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1, 2. The living creatures, which were before described, (i.) are here called cherubim. The cherubim that covered the mercy-seat, and that were placed in the holy of holies, or were figured upon different parts of the tabernacle and temple, were evidently emblematic of the holy angels, as fellow worshippers of the God of Israel: and the same seems to be the meaning of the word in every other passage of Scripture. (Marg. Ref.) From the great similarity betwixt the living creatures in the visions of Ezekiel, and of those in that of St. John, (Rev. iv.) commentators have generally concluded that they must be coincident. Hence many have explained the living creatures in St. John's vision of the holy angels: but their joining in the song, "Thou hast redeemed us to God "with thy blood," forms an insuperable objection to this, as well as to the unaccountable opinion of some, who would explain them to mean the three persons in the Trinity, and the human nature of Christ. Hence others, perceiving that the ministers and churches of Christ must be meant in St. John's vision, have interpreted Ezekiel's cherubim and wheels of the same: yet the latter is not a prophecy of what would come to pass under the Christian dispensation, but a representation of what was about to take place at Jerusalem. No good reason can be given, why the two visions should mean precisely the same thing: angels, as employed in God's providential government of the world, and faithful ministers, as employed in the affairs of the Church, may well be supposed, in different degrees, endued with the same gifts and actuated by similar principles; and so capable of being represented by the same emblems or hieroglyphics: for doubtless the former are, what the latter ought to be and would be. Nor should it be overlooked, that the cherubim had "every one four faces "apiece," (21.) whilst St. John's living creatures had the same faces divided among them. The wheels in Ezekiel are vastly different from the twenty-four elders in St. John, and admit of, nay require, a different explication. As therefore the whole of these visions and the context direct our thoughts to the dealings of God with the Jewish nation, especially in the destruction of the city and temple by the Chaldeans, and afterwards by the Romans; as the cherubim in the Scripture, generally at least, denote angels; and as wheels are a far apter emblem of the course of providence, than of any thing in the constitution of the Christian Church; insomuch that the heathen painted fortune, (which we consider as the secret appointment of God,) with a wheel, as an emblem of the same vicissitudes of human affairs: the interpretation already given seems far more consistent with the scope of the passage, and more satisfactory than that referred to. The prophet saw above the cherubim, as he had done before, (i. 26. the likeness of a throne, and doubtless as the appearance of a man upon it, who spake to him that was clothed in linen, who had been employed in marking the servants of God in the forehead; and he ordered him to go in between the wheels, under the cherub, (for one was connected with each of the wheels,) and thence to take burning coals, and scatter them over the city. Thus the burning of Jerusalem, as well as the slaughter of its inhabitants, was emblematically predicted. We suppose him that sat upon the throne to have been the eternal Son of God, the second person in the sacred Trinity; and the vision to represent his glory as the King of Israel, appearing from above the mercy-seat: the fire therefore from between the wheels, under the cherubim, seems to have signified the wrath of God, to be executed by the Chaldeans upon Jerusalem, for their contempt of the Lord's mercy, their abuse of his favours, their profanation of his ordinances and temple, the wickedness of the priests, and their murder of the prophets. V. 3—7. The cherubim stood on the right side of the temple, which is generally supposed to mean the north side; this might point out the quarter from whence destruction would come; or it intimated, that they stood at a distance from the idolaters before-mentioned. (viii.) The inner court also was filled with the cloud: the Lord had taken possession of his temple by this appearance, (1 Kings viii. 10, 11.) and he thus intimated that he was now about to withdraw from it. At the same time the visible glory removed to the threshold of the house; (Note, ix. 3, 4.) and then the court was filled with brightness, perhaps illuminating the cloud. Some think that it was the outer court that was filled with brightness, whilst the inner was filled with the dark cloud; denoting that the Lord would leave the Jews in darkness, and send his light unto the Gentiles. At the same time the sound of the cherubim's wings was heard without, "as the voice of the almighty God "when he speaketh:" i. e. like the sound of most tremendous thunder, or like the voice heard from mount Sinai when the law was given; which might intimate their triumphant admiration of the glorious justice and holiness of God in these awful dispensations, or the report that would be made of them to distant nations. Accordingly, when the man clothed in linen proceeded to execute his commission, one of the cherubim handed to him the fire, and he took it and went out, prepared to scatter it over the city; and this may denote, that the holy angels concur with each other in executing the divine mandates, whether of mercy or of judgment.

V. 12. This circumstance, as it related to the living creatures, was not before-mentioned: by the living creatures, (as well as the wheels,) being full of eyes in every part, their constant watchfulness, and their penetration, sagacity, and circumspection, may be denoted, (Rev. iv. 8.) 'The wheels were full of eyes round about; to show, 'that, however the course and event of things seem so 'unstable and uncertain, as if all ran upon wheels; and 'there does also appear a certain intricacy and perplexity in the proceedings thereof: yet that the infinite and 'most wise providence of God had foreseen and foreordained all things to his own holy purposes.' (Bp. Hall.)

V. 13. O Wheel. Or, Move round. 'They are put 'in mind of continually attending upon their duty: for 'the wheels and living creatures were animated with the 'same principle of understanding and motion.' (Lowth.) —If our translation be retained, the call to the four wheels, as one, may denote the unity of design and operation, which form the innumerable dispensations of Providence into one grand and consistent plan.

V. 14. Some have concluded from this verse, that the same faces were also marked upon the wheels; but it seems rather to be meant of the living creatures. The face of a cherub being here substituted for that of an ox in the former vision; it is generally thought that the cherubim in the temple were delineated with the countenances of oxen: yet the oxen and the cherubim are separately mentioned in one place. (1 Kings vii. 29.) If, however, this was the case, the hieroglyphical meaning alone should be attended to. (i. 10.)

h 7—11. xxiv. 3—14. Jer. i 13.

V. 18, 19. The glory of the Lord, departing from the threshold of the temple, removed to a greater distance, and rested above the cherubim: and they lifted up their wings, mounted with the wheels from the earth, and abode over the east-gate of the temple, as about entirely to remove from it. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 20. I knew, &c. The prophet now perceived that these living creatures had the same likeness in many respects, that he had seen of the cherubim at the temple, upon the walls, and doors of it, &c.; for he could not have seen the cherubim in the most holy place. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The holy angels, who watch over and minister to the saints of God, are often employed as the executioners of his vengeance on hypocrites and the enemies of his Church: (Acts xii. 7—10. 23.) Our God, from his mercy-seat between the cherubim, is a consuming fire to all who despise his great salvation: and his severest judgments will fall on those who abuse peculiar privileges, and are emboldened in their crimes by his patience and mercy.—Those awful dispensations, which excite the blasphemous objections and complaints of ungodly men, are viewed by holy angels as bright displays of the divine glory, and are celebrated with loud acclamations of praise and adoration. The terror of JEHOVAH's justice and holiness, and the examples of his indignation against his rebellious creatures, do not in the least interrupt their confidence, joy, and love: nor would they disquiet those whom Jesus hath delivered from the wrath to come; were it not for the weakness of their faith and the prevalence of their sins, which obscure the evidence of their reconciliation to God, and mar the comfort of their communion with him. Otherwise, what should Christians have to fear? All judgment is administered by him "who loved them and gave himself for them, to redeem them to God with his blood;" he is Head over all things to his Church, and all the angels are his ministering servants for their benefit. Let us then give diligence to make our calling and election sure; and in our several stations, as ministers or private Christians, let us copy the example of the holy angels, and walk circumspectly and intelligently; obey with promptitude and alacrity; and give up ourselves to be led by the Spirit of God, and disposed of in his providence, as he sees good. He will assuredly order every thing in perfect wisdom, truth, and love: we need fear nothing but hypocrisy, coming short of his grace, grieving the Holy Spirit, or dishonouring the Gospel. As the departure of God from Churches or nations must prove their ruin; so his departure, for a time and in part, from a believer who has offended him, must occasion great distress and anguish, and sometimes cause him to say, "The pains of hell have got "hold of me." What then will be the case of those to whom the righteous Judge shall at last say, "Depart from "me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the de-"vil and his angels?" Let this consideration warn sinners "to seek the Lord, while he may be found, and to "call upon him while he is near;" and also excite us all to walk watchfully and humbly with our God.

five men at the east-gate of the temple; but it is uncertain whether they were the same with the twenty-five men beforementioned; (viii. 16.) as they were not worshiping idols, but consulting about public affairs. It does not appear that they belonged to the sanhedrim, or great council of the nation; yet they were princes or nobles, who had great influence in the measures of government. Some writers inform us, that Jerusalem was divided into twenty-four districts, over each of which there was a prince or president, and one that was over them all was the ruler of the city. Amongst these princes the prophet distinguished two, who seem to have been the most eminent: and the Lord informed him, that this company, especially the two mentioned by name, were the persons that devised mischief and gave evil counsel in the city. Probably they encouraged idolatry, countenanced the false prophets, and persecuted the true prophets. They counselled the revolt from the Chaldeans, the alliance with Egypt, and the pertinacious opposition to the besiegers, in defiance of the warnings and predictions of God by Jeremiah and other prophets. They persuaded the people, that if there were any truth in the predictions of divine judgments on the city and land, they would not be fulfilled for a long time; that they might build houses, and attend to their temporal concerns, without any apprehensions. And in derision of Jeremiah's vision of a seething pot, (Jer. i. 13.) they added, that they were the flesh in this pot or caldron, the walls of the city would protect them against the Chaldeans, as the caldron keeps the fire from the flesh that is in it; that if they attempted to take them out, it would be at their peril. Thus they taught the people to harden themselves in rebellion against God. Some render the third verse thus: "Houses should not be built near the city: for it is about "to be the caldron, and we the flesh." But this interpretation does not agree with the general tenour of the chapter.

V. 5—12. Under the immediate impulse of the Holy Spirit, the prophet in vision seemed to himself to deliver the following message to these counsellors of rebellion: and this being afterwards written, and published, would come to their knowledge. He first reminded them of the wicked words which they had spoken; and assured them that the Lord was exactly acquainted with all their secret thoughts, counsels, and designs, their vain hopes, and rebellious devices. He next charged them, not only with shedding the blood of prophets and righteous men by their oppressions and persecutions; but also with murdering all the Jews, who had been or would be slain in the war, in which they so obstinately persisted: so that they multiplied their slain in the streets of the city. The city was indeed a caldron; and they who perished by their fault, by the sword and famine during the siege, were the flesh that should continue and be consumed in it; but that they themselves would be brought forth out of it: (Notes, xxiv. 1—13.) And as they had feared being put to death, if they surrendered to the Chaldeans, and had therefore determined to stand out to the last extremity, so they should be slain by the sword: the Lord would deliver them into the hand of the Chaldeans, and by their hands execute his judgments upon them; for Nebuchadnezzar would put them to death as criminals, at Riblah in the border of the land. (Marg. Ref.) Then it would appear that the city was not their caldron, and that they were not able to continue in it: seeing they had not obeyed the Lord, but had copied the idolatries and iniquities of all the surrounding nations.

V. 13. Whilst the prophet, in vision, was delivering this message to these princes, Pelatiah suddenly died. It is probable that he was actually cut off by some terrible death at Jerusalem at this time, or afterwards, when the prophecy was fulfilling; and in so remarkable a manner, as would render the vision much noticed. But when the prophet witnessed this accomplishment of God's word, as one who had the welfare of his people nearer his heart than his own character, he was greatly alarmed and distressed, and renewed his inquiries, whether the Lord meant to destroy all the remnant of his people Israel? (ix. 8.)

V. 14—16. The Lord was graciously pleased to relieve the anxiety of his servant respecting his people Israel, by directing his attention to the Jews, who were already in captivity. They were his brethren in distress, as well as by blood; and thus more nearly connected with him, than those in the land of Judah: especially as he was raised up to prophecy among them. Nay, the dispersed Israelites were more the objects of the Lord's special favour than the inhabitants of Jerusalem. Indeed, the latter treated the captives with disdain; they imagined that God had rejected them, and sent them into captivity as the greater sinners; or that their surrender to the Chaldeans was a forfeiture of their privileges, and even of their estates: they meant therefore to excommunicate and disinherit them, and to appropriate the city and land to themselves. But the Lord had other intentions; he had sent some of the people into captivity in order to their reformation; and though they were scattered among the Gentiles far from the temple, yet He "would be as a little Sanctuary" unto them in every place: that is, he would be their Protector and Support; he would answer their prayers, and give them the comfort of his presence: and when two or three of them met together, in a synagogue or a private house, their worship should be as acceptable, as if they had sacrificed at the temple: so that whilst the Jews at Jerusalem possessed many external religious advantages, without the power and presence of the Lord, because of their pride and hypocrisy, those in captivity among the Gentiles should have his presence and power among them, being enabled, to exercise humble faith, and to worship God in spirit and truth. This would be as a little Sanctuary in every place, a refuge to a few people, which would not excite either the jealousy or rapacity of their enemies, as the magnificent temple at Jerusalem had done. Such a promise evidently implied the future introduction of a new and more spiritual dispensation, when men should worship God with acceptance in every place. But as this little Sanctuary must, as it were, be entered by faith in Jesus Christ, the Door and the Way; so the Jews in their present dispersions have not the benefit of it, because of their unbelief; which renders their present dispersion far more dreadful than the Babylonish captivity.

V. 17—20. The Lord further promised to the captives, that they, or their posterity, should be restored to their own land, and become decidedly set against idolatry and other abominable wickedness. Few, however, of them seem at this time to have been true believers; but God engaged to prepare them for the blessings which he intended for them, by "giving them one heart, and by putting a "new spirit within them." The one heart, may either mean, that oneness of judgment, disposition, and affection, which the grace of God produces in his people; or that singleness of heart which distinguishes them from others. (Marg. Ref.) The hearts of the Jews had been divided among different idols, and they had endeavoured to worship both JEHOVAH and their idols, to serve him and their sins; but this change would cause them to serve him singly, wholly, and devotedly, and to renounce all idols, rivals, or worldly lusts. A new spirit would also be given them, that is, a new temper and disposition; a new light in the understanding and direction to the judgment; a new purity in their memories, imaginations, and affections; new desires, hopes, fears, joys, and sorrows; a new tenderness in the conscience, and submission in the will; the effect of the regenerating Spirit of God; for "that "which is born of the Spirit is spirit;" altogether spiritual, according to the law, truth, and image of God; disposed to repentance, faith, love conscientious obedience, and holy worship. At the same time the Lord would take away the stony heart out of their flesh, or from their corrupt nature: for "that which is born of the flesh is "flesh," carnal, and enmity to God. The stony heart denotes the natural insensibility, obduracy, and obstinacy, of fallen man. The carnal heart, like a stone, cannot be made to feel. Judgments, mercies, warnings, examples, are alike unavailing. The terrors from mount Sinai, the love of Christ, and the sweet promises of the Gospel, fail alike of producing suitable affections. Men live unconcerned amidst the dead and dying; they accumulate loads of guilt like mountains, and are neither dismayed nor humbled; and they often are as unfeeling to the miseries of others, as to their own danger. They are dead, insensible, and like a stone, that feels nothing from the hardest blow. But renewing grace creates a susceptibility of proper feeling in the soul and conscience: then a sinner learns to fear God, to stand in awe of his word, and to flee from his wrath. Then the mercies of God excite his gratitude, and the promises encourage his hope; he is humbled for his transgressions of the law; and unites love and gratitude with still deeper humiliation, by his knowledge of the Gospel. Then his heart becomes broken, his conscience tender, his affections easily moved to fear or compassion: a wrong temper now causes him more pain than numerous gross crimes once did; and the consideration of the shortness and uncertainty of life produces, in some measure, its proper effect on his conduct. His heart becomes as living flesh, which feels the least touch, and is now capable of joy and sorrow from spiritual objects, which before it was not. This change the Lord alone can work, and he promised to do it for Israel, in order that they might walk in his statutes; for without it spiritual obedience and worship cannot be performed: and thus he would be their God, and own them as his people. (Marg. Ref.) But though this must be interpreted as a prophecy of the restoration of the Jews and some of the Israelites to their own land; yet it is applicable, in its largest sense, to the true Israel, the elect of God, who all partake of this blessing in due season: and it seems also to foretel the future conversion of the Jews to Christ. 'Conversion is commonly spoken of in Scripture, as if it were 'a new creation, because of the new dispositions and 'powers which accompany it.' 'These promises chiefly 'relate to the conversion of the Jews, when God shall 'pour on them the Spirit of grace.' (Zech. xii. 10.) (Lowth.)

V. 21. The hearts of almost all the Jews in Jerusalem and Judah, and of numbers among the captives, walked after the heart of their detestable things. Their affections were habitually fixed upon idols; they were disposed to copy the licentiousness, cruelty, and fraud, which these supposed deities were represented to delight in; and they loved their gross and carnal worship. Or they took as much pleasure in worshipping Satan, (who was worshipped under the names and forms of all their idols,) as he did in receiving their adoration. And none of those who continued to act in this manner could have any interest in these promises; but they would be recompensed according to their own ways. 'Notwithstanding the mercies reserved 'for the penitent, the prophet mentions the heart of their 'detestable things,—because evil spirits, who were wor-'shipped in and by them, were pleased with the devotions 'in that manner paid to them.' (Lowth.)

V. 22—25. After the prophet had received all this information, he saw the cherubim and the wheels, with the glory of God above them, remove to a greater distance: they had before left the temple, and now they departed from the city eastward to the mount of Olives; the place from which Christ, the glory of the second temple, ascended into heaven, previous to its destruction. Then the prophet was, in vision, brought back into Chaldea, in the same way that he had been conveyed thence; the vision left him, his ecstacy terminated, and he found himself among the elders where he was at first. And afterwards he reported to them, and the other captives, all that he had seen and heard in this vision, (Notes, viii—xi.) and perhaps he also now explained the other signs which he had before shown to them. (Notes, iv—vii.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—13.

When those that are eminent in rank or abilities are destitute of the fear of God, and ridicule his truths and warnings, they are qualified to be extensively mischievous. Being ingenious in devising evil, plausible in counselling and vindicating it, and bold in carrying it into execution, they encourage numbers to harden themselves in rebellion against God, and to adopt and persist in the most pernicious and impious designs. But they should be reminded, that they must render an account to him, for all the mischief done by their influence; for all the blood shed in unjust and unnecessary wars, which their worldly policy has occasioned; and for all the murder that takes place in consequence of their oppression, persecution, and unrighteous decrees. How awfully do some men of this description multiply their slain, not only through the streets of a single city, or the districts of a kingdom, but through every quarter of the globe! and they will at length be as much distinguished by their punishment, as they now are by their crimes. But carnal policy is connected with infi-

CHAP. XII.

Ezekiel is ordered, by removing his goods, and breaking through the wall of his house, to give the people a sign of the taking of Jerusalem, of Zedekiah's flight, and of the captivity of the Jews, 1—16; by eating and drinking with trembling and anxiety, to prefigure the famine, and consternation of the Jews during the siege, 17—20; and to declare that this ruin was near at hand, as a rebuke to those who profanely spake of it as distant, 21—28.

THE word of the LORD also came unto me, saying,

2 Son of man, [a] thou dwellest in the midst of a rebellious house, [b] which have eyes to see, and see not; they have ears to hear, and hear not: for they are a rebellious house.

3 Therefore, thou son of man, [c] prepare thee * stuff for removing, and remove by day in their sight: and thou shalt remove from thy place to another place in their sight: [d] it may be they will consider, though they be a rebellious house.

delity: and such persons turn the oracles of God into ridicule, and persuade themselves and others that no evil shall happen unto them. If they cannot entirely shake off all regard to revelation, they conclude, that the wrath of God denounced against transgressors is doubtful, or at least distant; and that they may safely indulge their inclinations, and pursue their rebellious schemes for some time longer; that they have many years of life before them, and shall be able to take care of their souls at last. The love of the world, and dislike to religion, give Satan and his factors an amazing advantage against men, in tempting them to this procrastination: and thus they seduce, and ruin one another, until at last, when they are crying, Peace, peace, sudden destruction overtakes them, from which they cannot possibly escape. We should therefore plainly protest against these devisers of mischief, and wicked counsellors: we should show them the folly and impiety of their wicked words, and remind them that God knoweth all their thoughts and contrivances. We should also meditate on the same truths, with reference to ourselves: that we may watch our hearts and lips, and beg of God to examine and keep them for us. The worst fears of ungodly men will come upon them, and often by those sinful means which they use to secure themselves: and when sinners fear the sword of man more than the wrath of God, he will sometimes expose them to both, and execute his judgments upon them in this world as well as in the next. Thus he often singles out the ringleaders in impiety, infidelity, and wickedness, and renders them warnings to others, that they may repent and avoid such destructive paths. But though these awful dispensations verify the words of God's faithful servants; yet they cannot but be deeply affected by them: and will still plead with him to have mercy on those who remain.

V. 14—25.

The Lord often reserves for himself those persons of whom we had little hopes; and leaves to their own pride and lusts, such as we had the best expectations of: while they whom he afflicts and man despises, are commonly nearer the kingdom of heaven than their more prosperous and self-confident neighbours. Many are ready to imagine that they are exclusively the people of God, while others are gone far from him; when in fact they are idolizing some form or creed, and have no part nor lot in the matter: and they who rejoice in the calamities of their brethren, because they expect gain from them, and who are ready to anathematize and injure them for conscience' sake, are strangers to the power of godliness. But wherever the Lord casts the lot of those who truly fear him, he will be a Sanctuary unto them: they cannot be scattered at a distance from his protecting providence, from his throne of grace, from the consolations of his Spirit, or communion with the Father and his Son Jesus Christ: and he will gather into his heavenly kingdom, from every country under heaven, all those who have been delivered by his grace from all their detestable things and abominations. But without the one heart and the new spirit, which he bestows; except he take away the hard and stony heart, and give us the heart of flesh, we shall never truly repent, or believe and obey the Gospel. When the sinner feels his need of these blessings, let him bring these promises to the throne of grace, and present them as prayers in the name of Christ, and they will surely be performed. Then sin will be loathed, the Saviour will become precious, the heart will be made humble and contrite, the conscience tender; and the converted sinner will be inclined and enabled to walk in the Lord's statutes, and keep his ordinances and do them. Such are indeed the Lord's people, and he is their God and Portion: but they differ as much from notional professors of evangelical truths, as from Pharisaical despisers of them: and this sensibility of heart and conscience is the chief discrimination betwixt the true Christian and all other men. As for those whose hearts are habitually set upon their idolatries and iniquities; they are evidently under the dominion and condemnation of their sins, and the Lord will deal with them according to the covenant of works, and recompense their ways upon their own heads. And though he will not forsake his people; yet he may be driven away from any part of his visible Church, by the hypocrisy and iniquity of those who are called by his name: and wo be to them, when he withdraws his presence, glory, and protection! Finally, whatever ministers learn from the word or Spirit of God, whether concerning his judgments or his mercies, they must faithfully declare it all to the people, as far as they have opportunity afforded them.

4 Then shalt thou bring forth thy stuff by day in their sight, as stuff for removing: and thou shalt go forth [e] at even in their sight, as * they that go forth into captivity.

5 † Dig thou through the wall in their sight, and carry out thereby.

6 In their sight shalt thou bear it upon thy shoulders, and carry it forth in the twilight: thou shalt [f] cover thy face, that thou see not the ground: [g] for I have set thee for a sign unto the house of Israel.

7 And [h] I did so as I was commanded: [i] I brought forth my stuff by day, as stuff for captivity, and in the even I ‡ digged through the wall with mine hand; I brought it forth in the twilight, and I bare it upon my shoulder in their sight.

8 ¶ And in the morning came the word of the LORD unto me, saying,

9 Son of man, hath not the house of Israel, [k] the rebellious house, said unto thee, [l] What doest thou?

10 Say thou unto them, Thus saith the Lord GOD; [m] This burden concerneth [n] the prince in Jerusalem, and all the house of Israel that are among them.

11 Say, I am your sign: like as I have done, so shall it be done unto them: they shall § remove and go into captivity.

12 And [o] the prince that is among them shall bear upon his shoulder in the twilight, and shall go forth: they shall dig through the wall to carry out thereby: he shall cover his face, that he see not the ground with his eyes.

13 My [p] net also will I spread upon him, and he shall be taken in my snare: [q] and I will bring him to Babylon to the land of the Chaldeans; yet shall he not see it, though he shall die there.

14 And [r] I will scatter toward every wind all that are about him to help him, and all his bands; [s] and I will draw out the sword after them.

15 And [t] they shall know that I am the LORD, when I shall scatter them among the nations, and disperse them in the countries.

16 But [u] I will leave ‖ a few men of them from the sword, from the famine, and from the pestilence; [x] that they may declare all their abominations among the heathen whither they come; [y] and they shall know that I am the LORD.

NOTES.

CHAP. XII. V. 1—7. Ezekiel seems not, for the present, to have had any more visions of the divine glory; but to have received the revelations of the Lord's will, in the more ordinary manner of other prophets. Even the captives among whom he dwelt, were a rebellious house like their brethren in Judah; who would not use their senses and faculties, or avail themselves of the instructions of God's word and providence, for their advantage. After all that they had heard and experienced, they still expected that Jerusalem would be preserved from the Chaldeans, they deemed themselves unhappy in bondage, and hoped to be speedily restored to their country: this led them to neglect the duties of their situation, to listen to false prophets, to reject the word of God, and thus to rebel both against his commandments and providence. To certify them therefore of the vanity of their hopes, the prophet was ordered to make ready his furniture for removing to another habitation, in the sight of the people, and then to carry it, or some part of it, to a distant place; in hopes, (speaking after the manner of men,) "that the people would consi-"der, though they were a rebellious house." Thus he was directed to spend the day about his furniture; and in the evening to go forth as one that was afraid of being carried away captive: and to render his conduct more significant, he was to dig or break through the wall of his house, and to go forth by that opening, carrying part of his property or some provisions with him, as desirous to escape the enemy; and to cover his face, not only as in distress, but to disguise himself for fear of being detected. Having received such orders, he punctually obeyed them; and thus set before the eyes of the captive Jews the plundering of Jerusalem of all its treasures, and the removal of them and of the inhabitants to Babylon; the vain endeavours of the Jews to escape, and to carry off their property; and especially the conduct and fate of king Zedekiah

V. 8—16. Either the people had ridiculed the prophet's conduct, or they had contemptuously disregarded it. He was therefore commanded to inform them, that this burden, or prophetic sign of impending judgments, respected Zedekiah the prince in Jerusalem, under whose shadow they hoped to live among the nations; as well as all those of the families of Israel, who yet remained in their own land. As Ezekiel had removed his furniture, and changed his habitation; so would their property and persons be removed into another land: and the king himself would flee from the conquerors in the dust of the evening, with a burden on his shoulder and a covering on his face, in order to disguise himself; whilst his attendants would break through the wall to forward his escape. But the Lord would spread his net for him, and take him in his snare: for the Chaldeans would overtake him, and carry him to Babylon; yet he should not see that city, though he should die there. Jeremiah had predicted, that his eyes should see the eyes of the king of Babylon. (Jer. xxxiv. 3;) and here Ezekiel foretold, that he should not

17 ¶ Moreover, the word of the LORD came to me, saying,

18 Son of man, [z] eat thy bread with quaking, and drink thy water with trembling, and with carefulness;

19 And say unto the people of the land, Thus saith the Lord GOD of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and of the land of Israel; They shall eat their bread [a] with carefulness, and drink their water with astonishment, [b] that her land may be desolate from * all that is therein, [c] because of the violence of all them that dwell therein.

20 And [d] the cities that are inhabited shall be laid waste, and the land shall be desolate; and ye shall know that I am the LORD.

21 ¶ And the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

22 Son of man, [e] what is that proverb that ye have in the land of Israel, saying, [f] The days are prolonged, and every vision faileth?

23 Tell them therefore, Thus saith the Lord GOD; [g] I will make this proverb to cease, and they shall no more use it as a proverb in Israel; but say unto them, [h] The days are at hand, and the effect of every vision.

24 For there shall be [i] no more any vain vision, nor flattering divination within the house of Israel.

25 For I am the LORD: [k] I will speak, and the word that I shall speak shall come to pass; it shall be no more prolonged: for [l] in your days, [m] O rebellious house, will I say the word, and will perform it, saith the Lord GOD.

26 ¶ Again the word of the LORD came to me, saying,

27 Son of man, behold, they of the house of Israel say, The vision that he seeth is [n] for many days to come, and he prophesieth of the times that are far off.

28 Therefore say unto them, Thus saith the Lord GOD; [o] There shall none of my words be prolonged any more, but the word which I have spoken shall be done, saith the Lord GOD.

see Babylon; and Josephus says that he thought these two prophecies inconsistent with each other, and therefore believed neither of them: but both were exactly accomplished, when he was brought to Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah, and there had his eyes put out, and was carried to Babylon.—The Lord moreover declared, that all the Jews, who adhered to Zedekiah and survived the taking of the city, should be scattered through the nations, and be pursued by his judgments; and by the accomplishment of these predictions, they should be convinced that he was the eternal JEHOVAH, the Creator and Lord of all. Yet he would leave a remnant of them, that should escape all the divers kinds of death, which cut off the rest; and who might declare among the heathen all their abominations. Either their conduct would be so very vile, that the heathen might see the reason of the Lord's dealings with them, by witnessing their abandoned wickedness; or, being brought to repentance, they would confess their abominable idolatries and iniquities, and acknowledge the justice of God in his severity towards them; that so the heathen also might be made acquainted with the power, truth, and holiness of Israel's God. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 17—20. The Lord next directed the prophet to instruct the people by another sign. Whenever he ate or drank, he was to act like a man in great terror and anxiety; as if he feared that somebody would rob him of his food, or as if he were eating his last meal, and must then perish by hunger and thirst. This denoted that the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and those that remained in the land, would soon endure far greater miseries than their captive brethren had done; when they would, with astonishment, terror, and excruciating solicitude, perceive famine increasing upon them, and expect to have their scanty morsel taken from them by some other starving wretches, or to be slain while eating it: or that they must soon eat their last meal, and then die miserably by hunger. For the city and land would surely and speedily be desolated; because of the violence and oppression of the inhabitants.

V. 21—25. Emboldened by the long-suffering of God, and despising the declarations of his prophets, the Jews, (both in captivity and in the land of Israel,) commonly used to say to each other, "The days are prolonged, and every "vision faileth;" so that this became a proverb among them. They had been long threatened and were still spared; and they concluded that the visions of the prophets had failed. But the Lord assured them, that the event should speedily cause this impious proverb to cease; for the days were at hand, when every vision would take effect. Then the false prophets would be silenced, and their lying divinations detected; for the Lord would speak by his prophets, and cause his word to be noticed by immediately performing it, in their days, and upon the very persons to whom it was spoken.

V. 26—28. Perhaps, after the former message, the Jews altered their proverb; and, instead of saying that the vision failed, they only said, that it related to remote times, and distant events. Or this proverb was used, at the same time, by such as did not openly avow their infidelity. The Lord, however, ordered his prophet to assure them, that the time of his patience was expiring, and that he would immediately fulfil his most alarming predictions. This could not, at the most, be more than four or five years before the destruction of Jerusalem.

CHAP. XIII.

Ezekiel is ordered to prophesy against the false prophets; and to expose their folly and wickedness, and the fatal effects of their delusions, to others and themselves, under the emblem of a wall daubed with untempered mortar, and beaten down by a violent storm, 1—16: and against the prophetesses, who, by their signs and lying prognostications, encouraged the wicked in sin, and discouraged the righteous; and to predict their disgrace and ruin, 17—23.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—16.

It is often a painful trial to the faithful servants of God, to dwell among those who are most rebellious against him.—Men, as fallen apostate creatures, have eyes, ears, and understandings; but they are utterly destitute of a disposition to make a proper use of them, or of the advantages which they enjoy. This is the essence of their rebellion, and cannot possibly be allowed as an excuse for it: it counteracts all the endeavours of God's servants to instruct, convince, warn, or affect them; and it often discourages them from repeating the unsuccessful attempt. They should not, however, yield to despondency, but rather devise or adopt more and other methods of engaging the attention, convincing the judgment, or reaching the heart and conscience; if peradventure God "will give sinners re-"pentance, for the acknowledging of the truth, that they "may recover themselves out of the snare of the devil:" for none can know but they may hereafter consider, though they have hitherto been rebellious. To this end, the minister must not shrink from any hardship or personal inconvenience, which can evince his own deep conviction of the truth and importance of his message; nor should he fear any ridicule or reproach, that he may incur in the performance of his duty. He should especially at all times speak, and act, as a man who is deeply convinced, that here he hath no continuing city, and who is constantly preparing for a removal; who expects changes, disappointments, and difficulties, until that period arrives; and who is assured, that there can be no peace for the wicked, in any place or station in life. He also should seek to have his answer ready, when called upon to explain the grounds of his hope and the reasons of his conduct; that he may be able to speak pertinently, and convincingly to the consciences of those who make such inquiries. The word of God concerns princes as well as their subjects. Indeed in great national calamities, superior stations only expose men to more imminent perils and more acute sufferings; and in the eternal world, they will expose ungodly men to the deeper condemnation. The greatest princes will sometimes submit to extreme hardships and debasement to save their lives: they will endure fatigue, appear disguised like the meanest of their subjects, and be glad to be mistaken for them: what then should we not be willing to venture, renounce, suffer, or stoop to, to save our souls from the wrath to come? This may certainly be effected by all who diligently seek it in the way of the Gospel: whereas men's most earnest endeavours to preserve their lives, often prove ineffectual; or they are so taken in the Lord's net, that life is rendered as bitter as death is dreadful. Whilst ring-leaders in rebellion against God are singled out for punishment; such as concur with them will not escape: and either the open detection of crimes, or men's penitent confessions, will justify God before the whole world, in all the threatenings of his word, and the judgments that he inflicts.

V. 17—28.

Abused plenty generally ends in pinching want: and we may profitably meditate on the horrors of famine, when men grudge each other, and even themselves, every morsel, and behold with terror and anguish the speedy approach of more dreadful extremities: for we may thence learn to be thankful, moderate, and liberal in our use of plenty; and the more to hate and dread sin, which thus forfeits or embitters all our comforts, and not only desolates cities and nations, but ruins the souls of unnumbered multitudes. It is a grievous sign of deep degeneracy, when profane, infidel, and immoral speeches, become proverbial: but the Lord notices them, and will call to account those who use them; and will at length put them to silence and shame. "Be-"cause sentence against an evil work is not executed spee-"dily, therefore the hearts of the sons of men are wholly "set in them to do evil:" but, however men may wilfully mistake reprieves for pardons, and the Lord's long-suffering for the failure of the vision, the days are at hand when they will find every word of God to take effect. Then flattering teachers and infidels will be confuted and condemned; and the execution of his threatened vengeance will form an awful demonstration to them of the truth of the Scriptures.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIII. V. 1—4. The Lord had before intimated his displeasure against the false prophets; (xii. 24:) but Ezekiel was here ordered more fully and directly to enter his protest against them, as the other prophets had done. 'The true prophets often denounce God's judg-'ments against the false ones; laying to their charge many 'misdemeanors in their private conversation; and upbraid-'ing them for unfaithfulness in the office they undertook, 'of guiding and directing men's consciences.' (Lowth.) Some of the false prophets lived in Judah, and others of them among the captives in Chaldea. They vaunted themselves to be, and were considered by many as, the prophets of Israel; but they were the ruin of the people who confided in them. Ezekiel was therefore required to prophesy against them, not so much in expectation of bringing them to repentance, as in order to undeceive those whom they deluded. They had the character of being very discerning men, and were no doubt proud of their wisdom: but they were foolish prophets; because they followed their own fancies, and had received no revelations from God, though they audaciously ventured to speak in his name. Israel therefore must be informed, that their favoured prophets were like foxes in the deserts: that is, crafty, ravenous, and mischievous; always scheming something for their own interest, or shifting about to save themselves, without regard to the welfare of the people: thus they spoiled the Lord's vineyard, and devoured his flock; as the foxes from the desert marred the vineyards, and did mischief in the sheep-folds, of Canaan. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5. The wickedness of Israel had broken down the hedge of the divine protection, and opened a gap or breach for their enemies to enter at. And as, when such breaches are made in the walls of besieged cities, the officers and soldiers that defend them repair thither, and venture their lives in withstanding the foe, till the breach be built up again; so the prophets of Israel ought to have ventured all consequences, in endeavouring to bring the people to repentance: as well as to have opposed their prayers, examples, and instructions, to the prevalence of ungodliness, and the divine judgments which were coming upon them. But the false prophets attempted nothing of the kind: they neither sought to avert the approaching calamities, nor to prepare the people for them; but rather encouraged them to harden themselves against God, who had declared that he was coming to fight against them by the Chaldeans.

V. 6. The false prophets spake with such confidence and plausibility, and their predictions so accorded to the wishes of the people, that they assuredly expected to see them accomplished.

V. 9. The indignation of God would fall especially upon the false prophets, whose covetous carnal minds made them susceptible of strong impressions from the illusions of Satan: so that they first wilfully imposed on the people; and probably were afterwards judicially given up to strong delusions, to believe their own lies, and to expect that the Jews would prosper in resisting the Chaldeans. Thus they saw vanity and lying divination, and then they prophesied lies; and their predictions as much contradicted their former Scriptures, as they did the prophecies of Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and other later prophets. The Lord therefore declared, that they should not be in the assembly of Israel; either they would become open apostates, or be detected and excommunicated, or cut off by death: their names also would be expunged from the registers of the house of Israel; and their families should either be extinct, or not be able to claim any inheritance among those who returned from captivity; which would be an emblem of their exclusion from heaven, as not having their names written in the book of life.

V. 10—16. The peculiar guilt of these prophets consisted in their seducing the worshippers of God into idolatry and iniquity, and encouraging them to harden themselves in impenitence, by assuring them of peace and prosperity, at the very time when divine judgments were about to be poured out upon them. In this manner, perhaps, some one of them courted the favour of the people: and the rest, finding him caressed and followed, supported his false predictions by their confident assertions and vain reasonings. Thus they acted, as if a man were to build a wall with loose stones or bricks of earth, without cement; and others should labour to give it an appearance of stability, by daubing it over with mortar made of bad materials, and not properly mixed or tempered; and they should then expect that such a wall would protect them, or that a house built of such walls would serve for a secure habitation. The people supposed themselves safe from the assaults of the Chaldeans, because they vainly presumed, that, as the people of God, he was engaged by covenant to preserve them; not considering that they had forfeited the blessing by their crimes: and the prophets laboured to varnish over these presumptuous expectations by a variety of specious pretences. But the Lord by his prophet assured them that this worthless wall should certainly fall down, notwithstanding all their daubing. A tremendous shower of rain and hail would wash away all the untempered mortar, and then the stormy wind would rend the wall itself. This storm, arising from his righteous indignation, would level the wall to the ground and destroy its foundations, and consume those who builded it, or sheltered themselves under it, in its own destruction. That is, the Lord would send the Chaldeans to besiege and destroy Jerusalem, and desolate Judah; they would come with such force and fury as the Jews could by no means withstand; and their success would confute the lying predictions of the prophets, and subvert the false hopes of the people. When these events should take place, the false prophets would be reproached and taunted with their folly and presumption; till the Lord had accomplished his wrath upon them: and then they who trusted them, would be reminded by God and his prophets, that "the wall was no more, neither "they who daubed it." The latter part of the eleventh verse may be rendered thus: "I will send great hail-"stones; they shall fall; and the storm of a whirlwind "shall rend it."

V. 17—23. As the Lord endued some women with the Spirit of prophecy: so there were others, who pretended to it from secular motives. But the prophet was ordered to set his face against them too, and to charge them with prophesying out of their own hearts. As a token of the peace and security which they promised, they sewed pillows to their own arm-holes, or elbows, (20,) and to theirs who consulted them; intimating that they might indulge and repose themselves in security, for no enemy would disturb them. The meaning of the kerchiefs, or coverings, which they put "upon the head of every sta-"ture," (or of persons of every age indiscriminately,) is not so evident: some think that they were ornaments, with which they decorated those who consulted them, in token of victory and triumph; others suppose, that this was spoken figuratively, for their hoodwinking them, or keeping them in the dark by their delusions; but probably it was some superstitious observance, a kind of amulet or charm, that they employed to entice the people into their snares. "These women would tell every man his fortune, 'giving them pillows to lean on, and kerchiefs to cover 'their head; to the intent they might the more allure 'them.' For they thus hunted their souls; and, as it seems probable, not only promised the nation deliverance from the Chaldeans, but professed to protect by some spell or charm the lives of those who applied to them; nay, even to save their souls, by some absolution or indulgence which they vended. Thus they entangled the people in their deceptions, as if they could save the lives and souls of men, without any respect to their conduct and character. They seem to have been a company of fortune-tellers, who polluted or profaned the name of God, by pretending to sell his gifts at the most contemptible price; and to deal in divination, and such like impositions, as have in every age found eager purchasers. And they likewise attempted to terrify with denunciations of wrath, those pious persons who refused to bribe them; as if life and death, heaven and hell, were at their disposal! Thus they worked upon the fears and hopes of those who attended to their lies. But the Lord declared that he was against them, and all their signs and charms with which they terrified souls, to cause them to fly into their entangling net: and he would certainly tear them from them, expose them to shame, and deliver the people from their influence and power. Because their lies counteracted the intention and tendency of his word; distressing the minds of upright godly men, or grieving them, whilst they saw God dishonoured and souls deceived: whereas the whole revealed will of God tended to encourage such persons, and to make them joyful. On the other hand, their divinations tended to harden and embolden wicked men, by encouraging them to expect peace and safety in their evil ways; contrary to the express declarations of God, that "there is no peace for the wicked." He would therefore speedily terminate their delusions, and deliver his people, and so make his power and glory known to all concerned. 'To slay and to make alive, signify here 'to promise men life, or threaten them with death: so the 'prophet saith, he "came to destroy the city," (xliii. 2.) 'that is, to pronounce the sentence of destruction upon it.' Lowth.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—16.

Many possess great subtlety and sagacity, who are utterly destitute of true wisdom: and whilst the world admires their abilities, the Lord brands them as fools. This is most awfully the case with numbers, who make the sacred ministry a step to worldly consequence and affluence. They pretend to speak in the name of God; but have seen nothing of his glory, of the evil of sin, the worth of souls, the preciousness of Christ, the way of salvation, or the beauty of holiness! they follow their own fancies, human traditions, or Satan's illusions; and then ascribe the whole to the God of truth! they are subtle, rapacious, and insinuating, in winding themselves into favour and preferment, and pursuing filthy lucre; but they are sure to do mischief in the fold and vineyard of the Lord. Instead of standing in the gap to turn away his indignation from the people, by their prayers, holy examples, and zealous endeavours to promote true godliness, they widen the breach by their wicked lives and erroneous doctrines, their soothing and flattering delusions, which cause men to think themselves deserving of eternal life, even when the wrath of God abideth on them! Numbers follow the pernicious ways of such false teachers, "by reason of whom the way "of truth is evil spoken of;" and many are seduced to expect the accomplishment of their unscriptural assertions. But the Lord is against them, and hath not sent them: they shall not be written among the righteous, nor share the heavenly inheritance: Because, even because they seduce the professed worshippers of God, and promise men peace and salvation, without conversion, faith, or holiness. But indeed there are numerous ways, by which one heresiarch builds up a wall, and others daub it with untempered mortar! Some teach men to expect safety from a comparative decency of moral character; some on account of formal or superstitious observances; some because they belong to an orthodox part of the Church, and have got some notions of certain important doctrines; some because of their impressions and enthusiastic reveries; and others even by a direct abuse of the Gospel, and making Christ the minister of sin! Each of these descriptions can find specious reasonings, or a few detached perverted testimonies of Scripture, to countenance their delusions: and men of learning and ingenuity employ themselves in daubing these tottering walls with untempered mortar, to prevent their weakness from being discovered. But they are all alike distant from Christ, the true Foundation: they build not on him by a penitent faith, that worketh by love and produceth obedience: they either leave out his merits and atonement, or the work of his new-creating Spirit, or the substantial fruits of righteousness; and in different ways endeavour to varnish, paint, and repair the old building; instead of erecting a new one on a new foundation, for "an habitation of God through "the Spirit." How fair soever the wall, thus run up and daubed, may appear to the carnal eye, it will seldom stand the storm of temptation or persecution; and it will afford no shelter in the approaching tempest of death and judgment: then the justice and vengeance of God will rend it in pieces, and destroy it to the ground; and great will be the fall of it, and the ruin of all who have got under it for shelter. Nor will any of the human species be so loaded with ignominy, as they who have thus seduced their fellow sinners to trust in a lie, to their utter destruction: then it shall be inquired of them, "Where is your wall? and "where is the daubing, wherewith ye daubed it?" Whilst they whom they have deluded, will execrate them more than ever they admired and commended them. Let us therefore beware of those false prophets, who indiscriminately speak peace, and encourage people of every sentiment and character to expect salvation; and remember, that though Christ preaches peace to those, near or far off, who repent and believe the Gospel; yet he assures us that "he who believeth not shall be damned."

What manifold ways hath Satan of deceiving souls! yet because men are so much more disposed to believe soothing lies, than humbling awakening truths; none of his schemes or instruments, from the wretched fortune-teller to the learned heresiarch, are utterly unsuccessful. The various descriptions of deceivers, who revile or despise each other, agree in promising happiness to those whom the word of God condemns; and in discouraging and grieving those whom it comforts. The masses, indulgences, and protections of the church of Rome, and their anathemas and excommunications of those as heretics, whom they cannot hunt into their net; the pretended candour of many to men of almost every opinion, except those who steadily profess an attachment to the doctrines of Scripture; and the delusion of such as connect salvation with any kind of faith, and revile those as Pharisees, who judge of the tree by the fruits: all these, and many others, produce the same effects, in grieving and perplexing upright Christians, and in strengthening the hands of sinners, that they should not return from their wicked ways. But confident and mercenary impostors are too numerous to be particularly exposed. Some men's boasts and pretensions would almost persuade one, that health, life, and salvation were at their disposal, in order that they might enrich themselves by turning the gift of God into ready money: and the chief difference between modern and ancient pretenders seems to be, that the former expect a more valuable recompense than handfuls of barley and pieces of bread: and the signs or means which some of them employ, are at least as ridiculous as those used by these ancient prophetesses; and like them aptly show, how they dupe and hoodwink their votaries, and hunt souls into their net. Thus for a time they may, and sometimes do, entangle even the people of God; but he will deliver them out of their hands. They pollute the name of the Lord, by using it to sanction their mercenary impositions, and covering them over with a profession of religion; but he will vindicate his own glory, and make their folly and wickedness evident to all men: and though numbers are deluded and amused to their ruin; yet it will at last appear, that none were thus fatally duped, except such as hated the truth and had pleasure in unrighteousness. It however behooves Christians to keep close to the word of God, and in every thing to seek the teaching of the Holy Spirit, and to stand aloof from whatever appears suspicious. We should try every doctrine and pretension by its agreement with the Scripture, and its tendency to promote vital godliness: we should reject all that tends to discourage the humble believer, or to encourage the presumption of wicked men: we should shun all superstitious observances and vain inquiries into futurity: and so trust the promises of God, as to obey his commandments, committing ourselves and all our concerns to the keeping of his grace and providence.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIV. V. 1—5. (Marg. Ref.) It is uncertain, whether these elders of Israel were the leading persons among the captives; or, as some conjecture, certain elders from Jerusalem, who had come to Babylon about business, and who took that opportunity of seeing and hearing the prophet. They came, however, and sat before him to hear his word, and to make inquiries concerning the affairs of the nation. Probably they appeared very grave and devout, and gave great attention to his discourse; and perhaps he was ready to show them respect and favour. But the Lord saw through their disguises, and revealed their true character. Notwithstanding fair appearances, their hearts were set upon their abominable and filthy idols: they preferred the service of them to the holy worship of God; so that these were the stumbling-blocks, over which they fell into all kinds of iniquity; and yet instead of casting them behind their backs, they set them up before their faces, determined to cleave to them at all events. 'They are not only idolaters in their hearts;

6 Therefore say unto the house of Israel, Thus saith the Lord GOD; [l] Repent, and turn * yourselves from your idols; and [m] turn away your faces from all your abominations.

7 For every one of the house of Israel, or [n] of the stranger that sojourneth in Israel, which [o] separateth himself from me, [p] and setteth up his idols in his heart, and putteth the stumbling-block of his iniquity before his face, [q] and cometh to a prophet to inquire of him concerning me; I the LORD will answer him [r] by myself:

8 And [s] I will set my face against that man, and will make him [t] a sign and a proverb, and [u] I will cut him off from the midst of my people; [x] and ye shall know that I am the LORD.

9 And [y] if the prophet be deceived when he hath spoken a thing, I the LORD have deceived that prophet; [z] and I will stretch out my hand upon him, and will destroy him from the midst of my people Israel.

10 And [a] they shall bear the punishment of their iniquity: [b] the punishment of the prophet shall be even as the punishment of him that seeketh unto him;

'but they have actually set up idols and worshipped them.' (Lowth.) Could it then consist with the glory of God to give a favourable answer to the inquiries of such hypocrites? On the contrary, the prophet was instructed plainly to inform them, that the Lord had determined to answer all Israelites, without respect of rank or station, who came with idolatrous hearts to inquire of him, according to the multitude of their idols; either denouncing vengeance upon them proportioned to their aggravated crimes, or giving them up to be deluded to their ruin. Thus he would ensnare them in their own counsels, leave them to manifest the concealed wickedness of their hearts, show the world their abominable dispositions, and render then contemptible and miserable: seeing they were all totally alienated from him, through an infatuated attachment to idolatry.—'That I may deal with them according to their deserts, 'and thereby convince them, that I am a Searcher of 'hearts, and know the secret wickedness of their thoughts.' (Lowth.) 'He shall be led with lies, according as he de-'lighted therein.'

V. 6—8. The only way to escape the threatened judgments was by repentance, and by turning themselves, and endeavouring to turn one another, from their idols to the worship and service of God; and by turning away their faces with abhorrence from all their abominations, that they might look another way, and act in another manner. Thus, and thus only, could they expect an answer of peace. For every Israelite, nay, every proselyte or stranger dwelling in the land, would be dealt with according to the foregoing rule. If in their heart they separated from the Lord, favoured idolatry, and looked towards that great occasion of iniquity: and then, out of curiosity or a desire to serve God and idols too; to save appearances, or to obtain reputation, they should consult the prophets; the Lord would answer every such inquirer, not by the mouth of his prophet, but by himself and his own powerful vengeance. He would execute such punishment upon him, as should render him an example and proverb to all others; singling him out from his people, among whom he had impiously intruded; and making known his omniscience and omnipotence by detecting and avenging his crimes. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9—11. These inquirers would soon be weary of consulting God's prophets, and be disposed to apply to those of another character; who would be left, (like Ahab's prophets,) to the illusions of a lying spirit; and thus being deceived themselves, to believe that prosperity would attend the inquirers, they would deceive them also. This the Lord warned such men to expect: for he meant thus to punish their hatred of his truth and service. Though not the author of the deceived prophet's sin; yet his being left to fall into Satan's delusions was the effect of a judicial sentence against him; and God thus used him as the instrument of blinding and hardening hypocrites to their destruction. And, as the false prophet only sought his own interest or credit in his predictions, and for that sin was given up to strong delusions to believe a lie; as the man who consulted him only sought encouragement in his idolatry and wickedness; and as the enmity of their hearts against God prepared them to welcome these delusions, which emboldened them to further rebellion: so the Lord would punish them in awful indignation, and cause them to bear the load of their atrocious guilt, which would involve both the deceived prophet and the hypocritical inquirer, in the same terrible destruction. Yet this severity to individuals would prove mercy to the house of Israel, by warning them against idolatry and iniquity, that they might still continue the people of God. (Marg. Ref.)

15 If I cause [o] noisome beasts to pass through the land, and they * spoil it, so that it be desolate, that no man may pass through because of the beasts:

16 Though [p] these three men were † in it, [q] as I live, saith the Lord GOD, [r] they shall deliver neither sons nor daughters; they only shall be delivered, but the land shall be desolate.

17 Or if [s] I bring a sword upon that land, and say, Sword, go through the land; [t] so that I cut off man and beast from it:

18 Though these three men were in it, as I live, saith the Lord GOD, they shall deliver neither sons nor daughters, but they only shall be delivered themselves.

19 Or [u] if I send a pestilence into that land, [x] and pour out my fury upon it in blood, to cut off from it man and beast:

20 Though [y] Noah, Daniel, and Job, were in it, as I live saith the Lord GOD, they shall deliver neither son nor daughter; they shall but deliver their own souls [z] by their righteousness.

21 For thus saith the Lord GOD; ‡ How much more when I send [a] my four sore judgments upon Jerusalem, the sword, and the famine, and the noisome beasts, and the pestilence, to cut off from it man and beast?

22 Yet, [b] behold, therein shall be left a remnant that shall be brought forth, both sons and daughters: behold, they shall come forth unto you, and [c] ye shall see their way and their doings: and [d] ye shall be comforted concerning the evil that I have brought upon Jerusalem, even concerning all that I have brought upon it.

23 And they shall comfort you, when ye see their ways and their doings: and ye shall know [e] that I have not done without cause all that I have done in it, saith the Lord GOD.

V. 13—21. The faith, obedience, and prayers of Noah prevailed to the saving of his house; though not of the old world: and he was assured that the earth should not be deluged a second time. Job's sacrifice and intercession in behalf of his friends were accepted: and Daniel had prevailed with God for the discovery of Nebuchadnezzar's dream, by which his companions and the wise men of Babylon were preserved from death. (Notes, Dan. ii.) (It was a singular honour for Daniel, who was not at this time above thirty years of age, to be ranked with these ancient eminent saints of God, who were most honoured by the answers given to their prayers in their own time.) Yet if these three eminent saints of different ages had all lived at once, and united in intercession for a land which was ripe for judgment, they would not have prevailed. But their righteousness would either have exempted them from temporal calamities, or converted them into blessings. Not that it could be the ground of their acceptance; but their righteous conduct would evince them to be justified persons and partakers of God's grace and favour; and thus ensure his protection and their everlasting salvation, according to the tenour of the new covenant. The prayers, examples, and pious labours of eminent believers have often checked the progress of national wickedness, promoted reformation and true religion, and thus tended to the lengthening of public tranquillity; and there is abundant encouragement, during the time of the Lord's patience and mercy, to use means for the conversion of children, relatives, and neighbours; yet when that time expires and the days of vengeance arrive, no intercession can prevail for the impenitent; nor can any righteous man deliver his nearest relations from destruction. But if this were the case with any nation, whose grievous transgressions had provoked God to commission either famine, destructive beasts, war, or pestilence, to execute his righteous vengeance upon it: if such men as Noah, Daniel, or Job, could not prevail for the preservation of a single person, even one of his own children: how much more would this be the case with Jerusalem and Judah, whose unprecedented crimes had provoked God to commission against them all these four sore judgments at once, to the total desolation of the land! The nation therefore must not hope to escape, because of a very few pious men among them: individuals must not expect safety, because related to pious persons: nor ought Daniel, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, or other prophets, to repine, that the Lord would not preserve Jerusalem for their sakes, or in answer to their prayers.

V. 22, 23. Though the Lord determined to desolate Jerusalem and Judah, and to execute his sore judgments on the inhabitants; yet, for his own name's sake, and out of respect to his covenant with Abraham and David, and his promises relative to the Messiah, he would preserve the lives of a remnant of Jews, both sons and daughters, that they might yet increase for the future replenishing of the land. These would be carried captive into Chaldea: and when the few pious Jews, that were there before, should see their ways and doings, they would be comforted concerning the evil that the Lord had done to Jerusalem, perceiving that he had good cause for all the severity which he had exercised; and taking encouragement to expect the performance of his promises of a future restoration, and many blessings to the people. It is not certain whether this consolation and satisfaction would result from noticing the atrocious wickedness of the captives; or from hearing their penitent confessions and declarations of the crimes, which filled Jerusalem and Judah. But probably many of them showed very plainly, by their abandoned conduct, for what crimes the Lord had executed vengeance on the nation; and some others, being brought to repentance, made such a report of the abominations which they had witnessed, as silenced all objections, and composed the minds of the pious remnant to cheerful acquiescence and confidence in the truth and mercy of God.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

Very wicked men may assume such specious appearances of piety, as to impose upon the most discerning of God's ministers: for who can know what secret abominations are practised in the lives, or what unmortified lusts abound in the hearts, of some, who behave themselves devoutly under the preaching of God's word, and the administration of his most solemn ordinances? But the Lord seeth through every disguise, and will certainly unmask every dissembler: and as his answers are addressed to men according to their characters; so we should show, as well as we can, to whom the comforts, and to whom the terrors belong; dividing the word of truth according to the character, conduct, and disposition of our hearers; and leaving the Lord, by means of their consciences, to make the application to individuals. All the wickedness of man springs from a heart estranged from the holy character, law, and service of God, through the idolatrous love of himself, and of the creatures. No external decency, form, or reformation, can be acceptable to God, so long as any idol possesses the heart and rivals him in our affections; yet how many sit to hear his word, and join in his worship and at his table, who idolize riches, pleasures, honours, and the praise of men! who seek happiness from such distinctions, and confide and rejoice in them, rather than in the love and service of God! And how many, who prefer their own wisdom and righteousness to his glorious salvation! Thus, instead of saying "What have I to do any more with idols?" and casting them away with abhorrence; they resolutely cleave to them; and these prove stumbling-blocks, over which they fall into iniquity and misery. (Marg. Ref.) By their secret attachment to worldly objects, they are prepared to be seduced by Satan, and to commit scandalous crimes; or, loving this present world, they apostatize from God; or cares, riches, and sensual lusts, render them unfruitful cumberers of the ground, fit for nothing but to be hewn down and cast into the fire: and should the Lord be inquired of by such men, or give encouragement to them? Assuredly he will answer them according to the multitude of their idols and iniquities: he will set his face against them, and make them examples of his vengeance: whilst their hypocritical worship will only aggravate their guilt and punishment, and they shall know that the Lord cannot be imposed upon like their fellow mortals. Such persons often grow weary of faithful ministers, and want teachers after their own lusts, to comfort them in their evil courses; and they find others of like character ready enough to "teach things which they ought not, for filthy lucre's "sake." Thus evil men and seducers are multiplied, and "grow worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived;" but the Lord over-rules the whole in awful righteousness to their mutual delusion and aggravated destruction. He sets his face against some such teachers and professors of the Gospel, for a warning to others; his punishments and threatenings have a tendency to alarm the consciences of the unconverted, and to caution his people to go no more astray from him; and they are made useful to upright believers. The door of mercy is still open: sinners are still called on to repent and return from all their abominations: and all are admitted amongst the Lord's people, and have him for their God, who seek to be cleansed by "washing in the Fountain "which he hath opened for sin and uncleanness."

V. 12—23.

God will inflict many sore judgments on individuals and nations who sin against him: a remnant of pious persons may indeed for a time avert, or retard national judgments; but they cannot possibly prevail with him to tolerate wickedness, or to save men in their sins; nor could they in their right mind desire it, even in behalf of their own sons and daughters. The Lord will certainly deliver his servants from all evil, and preserve them to his heavenly kingdom; and he will satisfy them as to his dealings with those for whom they pleaded in vain: but when the day of patience is expired, the same word and oath of God, which ensure the believer's salvation, are engaged for the condign punishment of the wicked. At present the whole creation groaneth through the sins of men, and the very beasts of the field in various ways share the miseries of mankind. But in the future world sinners alone will suffer, and in proportion to their personal guilt. Then the assembled universe will see, that the Lord hath not done without cause, all that he hath done against them: and his servants will be satisfied with his decisions, even against their nearest relatives. For the detection of men's sins will manifest the justice of God in their punishment; even as the humble confessions of true believers now magnify the precepts and penalty of his holy law, and give all the glory of salvation to his grace. In a firm belief that we shall approve the whole of God's dealings with ourselves and with all mankind, when it shall be fully made known to us, let us now impose silence upon our rebellious murmurs and objections, the offspring of pride, ignorance, and unbelief; let us discard our useless anxiety about the case of others, assured that the Judge of all the earth will do right; and let us compose our minds into patient resignation to his will, which in all things is holy, just, and good.

AND the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

2 Son of man, [a] What is the vine-tree more than any tree, or than a branch which is [b] among the trees of the forest?

3 Shall [c] wood be taken thereof to do any work? or will men take a pin of it to hang any vessel thereon?

5 Behold, when it was whole, it was † meet for no work: how much less shall it be meet yet for any work, when the fire hath devoured it, and it is burned?

6 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD; [f] As the vine-tree among the trees of the forest, which I have given to the fire for fuel, so will I give the inhabitants of Jerusalem.

7 And [g] I will set my face against them: [h] they shall go out from one fire, and another fire shall devour them; [i] and ye shall know that I am the LORD, when I set my face against them.

NOTES.

CHAP. XV. V. 1—5. Ezekiel, and his companions, seem not to have been easily satisfied about the predicted judgments on their city and nation, which they had been used to consider as holiness to the Lord. He was therefore graciously pleased to represent to them the propriety of these dispensations by an apt similitude; which would also counteract the presumptuous hopes of the people. The Church and nation of Israel had often been compared to a vine; (Marg. Ref.) Now a vine is most valuable if it be fruitful; otherwise it is almost as unsightly and worthless as a bramble: other fruit-trees may be of some use for timber: but the vine is of no value except for its fruit. "What is the vine tree more than another tree, "or even than a branch of the trees of the forest?" Wood could not be taken from it for any work; not even for a pin, or peg to hang a vessel on. Only some parts of other trees are used for fuel: but the ends and the middle, the whole of the vine when cut down, as well as the prunings of it from year to year, are consigned to the fire, and nobody attempts to reserve any part of it for other uses. And if it be useless, before it be cast into the fire, what can it be good for when almost consumed?

V. 6—8. The nation of Israel, of which the inhabitants of Jerusalem were the chief, was, in respect of other nations, as the vine in respect of the trees of the forest. Other nations were renowned for arts and arms, and became eminent and formidable, and the Lord used them in his providence as he saw good: but Israel was his vine, from which he looked for the fruits of spiritual worship and holy obedience. They, however, proved unfruitful, or brought forth poisonous berries like the wild vine. He would therefore at present make no use of them, except as fuel to the fire of his indignation, that his justice might be glorified in their punishment. By the ruin of the ten tribes, and the preceding judgments executed upon Judah, both ends of the vine were already burned, and the Lord meant not to preserve the middle. He had set his face against Jerusalem and Judah, as an adversary; and the people would be consumed by one calamity after another, till the land should be utterly desolated.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The condescension of God to the infirmity of his servants, in satisfying them of the equity and propriety of his dealings with sinners, is very great. Men are very prone to value themselves on those distinctions and advantages, which, not being productive of suitable effects upon their hearts and lives, render them doubly criminal. Unholy professors of the truth, and hypocritical worshippers of God, are, in his judgment, the refuse of the human species; for they dishonour his name more than other sinners do, and will be rendered by him proportionably contemptible. No eminency in other endowments can avail them any thing; for fruitfulness in good works is the proper excellency of a professed Christian: and indeed, in all other things the Church hath generally been eclipsed by the people of the world. When the worshippers of God therefore do not glorify him, adorn the Gospel, and serve their generation, by their holy lives, they are condemned as refuse wood, as thorns and briers, and prove as dry fuel to the flames: and when the Lord sets his face against them, they will go from one fire to another, till they be consumed. Let us then beware of an unfruitful profession: let us come to Christ and abide in him, and seek to have his words abide in us: then shall we bring forth much fruit, glorify God, and be approved as true disciples of the Lord Jesus; whilst the unfruitful branches will be broken off, gathered together, and cast into the fire.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVI. V. 2. Ezekiel prophesied in Chaldea; but his predictions chiefly related to the Jews in their own land, and tended to corroborate those of Jeremiah; and Jeremiah, whilst he prophesied at Jerusalem, sent messages to the captives. Thus the two prophets assisted each other, by this apparent interference with one another's work. In the foregoing chapter, the conduct of God towards the Jews had been justified, by showing that they were an unfruitful vine: yet this was not the worst; the horrible crimes committed by them, merited the severest punishments. But pride and self-flattery rendered the people blind to all the abominations which filled Jerusalem: these the prophet was to represent to them by a parable, that they might see themselves as in a glass, and discover what manner of persons they were.

V. 3—5. The subsequent allegory or parable, immediately related to the nation of Israel; but as that was the visible Church of God and a type of his true people, it has generally been accommodated to the case of individual believers: yet, unless this be done with great caution, we shall draw very wrong conclusions from it. For every one must perceive the absurdity of supposing, that true believers, after conversion, actually run into all the enormous wickedness here described, so as to exceed in every abomination the worst enemies of religion. The prophet was commanded to remind Jerusalem of her base and mean original. It is evident, that the allegory at first relates to the whole nation of Israel; though afterwards a distinction is made between Jerusalem and Samaria. Jerusalem, though afterwards the holy city, was originally built by the Canaanites, and generally inhabited by the Jebusites, (who were descended from Canaan,) (Gen. x. 15, 16.) till David took it. Yet Jerusalem's birth and nativity of the land of Canaan refers rather to the inhabitants than to the city itself. Abraham and Sarah, the ancestors of Israel, had originally been idolaters, as the Hittites and Amorites were: and their posterity, when they had expelled these nations, and possessed their land, seemed to be their descendants, as resembling them in character and conduct.—'Thou boastest to be the seed of Abraham; but thou art 'degenerate, and followest the abominations of the wicked 'Canaanites, as children do the manners of their fathers.' —The nativity of Israel, as a distinct people, may be dated from the time when the family of Jacob was multiplied into a nation. But at this period, they were reduced to abject slavery, and cruelly oppressed; they drudged in the brick-kilns, and were covered with the clay; their male-children were ordered to be slain or exposed; they were apparently deserted of God, and in general forgetful of him, and polluted with the idolatries, superstitions, and vices of their oppressors. Thus the new-born nation, (so to speak,) was like an infant, that was cruelly cast out and exposed, (according to the barbarous custom of ancient times;) that had none to wash, cleanse, clothe, or do any thing for it; but was left, as unpitied and loathed, to perish in the day on which it was born. This was an apt representation of the wretched and perilous condition of Israel in Egypt, and it is also a striking emblem of our original state of sin and misery.

V. 6—8. Whilst this perishing infant lay defiled and trampled on in its blood, a loathsome as well a miserable object, the Lord passed by, beheld it with compassion, and said to it, "Live." Nothing in the character of Israel deserved his favour or attracted his esteem; but every thing was suited to excite his abhorrence and to merit his indignation: yet from mere compassion and good will he preserved the nation. He spake with power; and by his word he restrained the rage of their Egyptian oppressors, and at length redeemed Israel from bondage. By his blessing they had multiplied exceedingly in Egypt: at length they were brought forth with an outstretched arm, and formed into a powerful nation under rulers and princes of their own. The Lord also adorned them, by giving them

9 Then [q] washed I thee with water; yea, I throughly washed away thy * blood from thee: and I [r] anointed thee with oil.

10 I [s] clothed thee also with [t] broidered work, and shod thee with [u] badgers' skin, and [x] I girded thee about with fine linen, and I [y] covered thee with silk.

11 I decked thee also with ornaments, and [z] I put bracelets upon thy hands, and [a] a chain on thy neck, 12 And I put a jewel on thy † forehead, and [b] ear-rings in thine ears, [c] and a beautiful crown upon thine head.

his righteous laws and statutes; and setting up his tabernacle, and manifesting his power and presence among them, by the ark of the covenant, the pillar of fire and cloud, the solemnities of mount Sinai, and the miracles which he wrought for them. Thus the out-cast infant grew up to be a marriageable woman, of comely form and excellently decorated: that is, Israel was prepared to be admitted into covenant with God, and espoused to him to bring up children to him. This he had in view from the first: when he passed by, and saw the perishing out-cast, it was "a "time of love;" he intended first to be a Father, and then a Husband unto her: so that "he spread his skirt over "her," and espoused her to himself, covering the shame of her former destitute condition, taking her under his immediate protection, and ennobling her by this high and honourable relation. This covenant was confirmed with an oath, or engagement to fidelity, and thus Israel became the Lord's peculiar people. And as a wife, (especially when taken from so destitute a situation, and favoured in so extraordinary a manner,) is bound to the most unreserved fidelity, obedience, love, and regard to her husband; so Israel was bound by every possible obligation to a devoted attachment to God, and an entire dependence on him, as his holy worshippers and obedient servants. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9—14. These verses enumerate the several benefits conferred on Israel, from their low estate in Egypt, to the height of their prosperity and greatness in the days of David and Solomon. The washing with water, might refer to the frequent ablutions and purifications appointed by the ceremonial law; but it included all the methods, which the Lord used to render Israel a holy nation, to purge them from the idolatries and defilements of Egypt, and to prepare them for his spiritual worship and service. The anointing with oil, though employed in preparing women for their nuptials on some occasions, (Marg. Ref.) may refer to the holy oil used in the consecration of the priests and the vessels of the sanctuary: and it signified the gifts and graces bestowed on numbers, for the edification and benefit of the nation, in order to their consecration to the Lord. The various ornaments afterwards mentioned, (which doubtless accorded to the attire of females of the highest rank in those times,) represented Israel's settlement and prosperity in Canaan; the wealth, power, and honour to which they were advanced, especially under David and Solomon; the building and enriching of the temple; and all the temporal and spiritual benefits, by which the Lord distinguished them as a people dear unto him. So that the exposed infant, being rescued and educated, and espoused to the Lord, was advanced to be a princess, whose ornaments, raiment, and provisions, were suited to her high and distinguished rank. Israel from the most abject state, became a powerful kingdom, renowned among the nations for the wise and equitable administration of their princes, the excellence of their laws, and the prosperity and happiness of the people: this was all owing to "the comeliness" or honour which the Lord had put upon them; and it rendered them a complete pattern for other nations to copy after. In this the case differs from the espousals of the meanest woman to the mightiest monarch: she may owe all her rank and ornaments to him; but her beauty must be the gift of the Creator. No doubt this is emblematical of a sinner's conversion, and of the believer's privileges; but the external means, or the signs of spiritual blessings, rather than the blessings themselves, must be intended, as it is spoken of Israel. 'As the child is always washed 'with water as soon as born, (4. 9.) is not this referred 'to, by the use of water in Christian baptism, as the em-'blem of regeneration?" (Mede.)

V. 15—22. Adultery in every case has always been deemed a very heinous offence: but it would have been peculiarly aggravated in a woman, who had been favoured and advanced in the manner above described. Thus idolatry in others might be deemed spiritual fornication; but in Israel it was adultery; a violation of the marriage-covenant, accompanied with the basest of ingratitude, and evidencing a most depraved state of the heart; inexpressibly dishonourable to God, when the basest idols were deliberately preferred before him; a provocation of his jealousy; a forfeiture of all the privileges of the nation, and an introduction to every other kind of wickedness. The sacred writers in general use this allusion, because of the similarity of principles from which idolatry and adultery originate; because both of them are extremely infamous and hateful; and perhaps because idolatry and lewdness commonly went together. But this prophet spake of it in an indignant manner peculiar to himself; and he exposed Israel's infamy in language taken from the conduct of the most shameless prostitutes, and suited to mark their crimes most loathsome and detestable. The wretched outcast, having been advanced, enriched, adorned, and prospered by her espousals to God, instead of making a suitable return for such singular favours, grew proud of her beauty; and, confiding in her attractions, courted the admiration of other lovers, committed adultery with them, and soon became a common prostitute. That is, Israel became proud of their numbers, strength, riches, reputation, and privileges; and thus departed from God, made alliances with the heathen nations, and worshipped their idols. This was in some measure the case, from the time of the golden calf in the wilderness, through their successive generations: but it became more so in the latter years of Solomon, and afterwards when Jeroboam established idolatry in the kingdom of the ten tribes, and under the idolatrous kings of Judah till the captivity. The adulteress also took the garments that her husband had provided for her, and with them formed and adorned splendid tents, in which to meet her paramours: that is, Israel spent their wealth and abundance in building and decorating idol-temples, and maintaining the idolatrous worship at them. This the Lord abhorred as base beyond example, and he determined to put an end to it; as the jealous husband refuses to support the extravagance of his wife, who spends his substance in entertaining her paramours. They had also formed their gold and silver into graven images: and though these were of various forms, both male and female, yet they are here represented as images of men, with whom the adulteress committed lewdness: and she even preferred these lifeless images to the company of her husband; that is, Israel preferred the worship of dead idols to that of the living God. Not only did they lavish all the productions of Canaan in the service of idols; but they burned their children in the fire to Molech, who were also the children of the covenant, and devoted to the Lord in circumcision: as if a woman should not only waste her husband's wealth on her lovers, but should murder the children she had borne to him, in order to gratify them! And could such conduct be deemed a small matter, an excusable misdemeanor? But in all these abominable idolatries, they had not remembered the low and defiled condition from which God had delivered them, nor any of the favours that he had bestowed on them.

Pass through. 'The word signifies also to dedicate. '(Ex. xiii. 12. marg.) The Jews, instead of dedicating 'their first born to God, as the law required, offered them 'up as sacrifices to the devil, that was worshipped in 'their idols.' (Lowth.) fornication [l] in the land of Canaan unto Chaldea; and yet thou wast not satisfied herewith.

30 How [m] weak is thine heart, saith the Lord GOD, seeing thou doest all these things, [n] the work of an imperious whorish woman;

31 * In that thou buildest [o] thine eminent place in the head of every way, and [p] makest thine high place in every street; and hast not been as an harlot, [q] in that thou scornest hire;

32 But as [r] a wife that committeth adultery, which taketh strangers instead of her husband!

33 They [s] give gifts to all whores: [t] but thou givest thy gifts to all thy lovers, and † hirest them, that they may come unto thee on every side for thy whoredom.

34 And the contrary is in thee from other women in thy whoredoms, whereas none followeth thee to commit whoredoms: and in that thou givest a reward, and no reward is given unto thee, therefore thou art contrary.

35 ¶ Wherefore, [u] O harlot, [x] hear the word of the LORD:

36 Thus saith the Lord GOD; [y] Because thy filthiness was poured out, [z] and thy nakedness discovered, through thy whoredoms with thy lovers, and with all the idols of thy abominations, [a] and by the blood of thy children, which thou didst give unto them;

37 Behold, therefore [b] I will gather all thy lovers, with whom thou hast taken pleasure, and all them that thou hast loved, with all them that thou hast hated; I will even gather them round about against thee, and will discover thy nakedness unto them, that they may see all thy nakedness.

38 And I will judge thee, ‡ as women that break wedlock and [c] shed blood are judged; and I will give thee blood in fury and jealousy.

39 And I will also give thee into their hand, and [d] they shall throw down thine eminent place, and shall break down thy high places: they [e] shall strip thee also of thy clothes, and shall take § thy fair jewels, and leave thee naked and bare.

40 They [f] shall also bring up a company against thee, and they shall stone thee with stones, [g] and thrust thee through with their swords.

V. 23—29. This adulterous wife is represented, as having less and less reserve in her licentiousness: after all her former adulteries, for which a dreadful wo was pronounced on her, she builded for herself an eminent place, or a brothel, as well as made high places in every street of Jerusalem. This may refer to the conduct of Manasseh and other kings of Judah, who made the temple itself the scene of their open and abominable idolatries, in addition to all their other idol temples! Thus at length their relation to God, and the temple itself, tended to render them more odious and despicable; as even libertines despise women who are shameless in their conduct. Allured by the prosperity of the Egyptians, they connected themselves with them, and joined in their multiplied and abominable idolatries, for which they were noted above other nations. And though the Lord frequently corrected Israel for their crimes, by wars, famines, and other judgments; delivering them into the hands of their enemies; (as men confine, and treat harshly their adulterous wives;) though he especially punished them by the Philistines, who are represented as ashamed of the enormous idolatry of the Jews, though idolaters themselves: yet, instead of being amended by it, they formed alliances with the Assyrians and worshipped their gods: yea, they followed every idol, that was worshipped by the several nations betwixt Canaan and Chaldea; and still they were not satisfied, but sought out new objects of their abominable idolatry. 'Thou hast 'defiled thyself with the idolatries of the heathen, beginning with those practised by the former inhabitants of 'Canaan, and by degrees learning new species of idolatry 'from distant countries, such as Chaldea.' (Lowth.)

V. 30—34. The powers of the soul should restrain and govern all the inferior inclinations; so that strong and ungovernable lusts prove a weak and inactive mind. How weak then must be the heart of this adulteress, who was enslaved to her lusts, and copied the most abandoned prostitutes; and who yet acted with imperiousness, disdaining authority or control, and was as much under the power of pride as of sensuality! How senseless and irresolute must Israel be, who preferred a rabble of dunghill deities to the living God! who scorned his merciful authority, and yet were proud of their abused privileges! In one respect this harlot differed from others; she did not commit wickedness for hire; which, though a base motive, implies some palliation of guilt, especially when sharp necessity urges: but she was a wife, who abounded in all things; and yet, from mere licentiousness and aversion to her husband, she prostituted herself to the basest strangers, and lavished his wealth in hiring them to come to her: that is, Israel always prospered when they adhered to the worship of the Lord; but were always impoverished and enslaved when they forsook God, and ran into idolatry: and the alliances that they formed with the neighbouring nations, (which made way for worshipping their idols,) were expensive at the time, and ruinous in the event.

41 And they shall [h] burn thine houses with fire, [i] and execute judgments upon thee in the sight of many women: [k] and I will cause thee to cease from playing the harlot, and thou also shalt give no hire any more.

42 So [l] I will make my fury toward thee to rest, and my jealousy shall depart from thee, and I will be quiet, [m] and will be no more angry.

43 Because [n] thou hast not remembered the days of thy youth, [o] but hast fretted me in all these things; behold, therefore, [p] I also will recompense thy way upon thine head, saith the Lord GOD: and thou shalt not commit this lewdness, above all thine abominations.

44 ¶ Behold, [q] every one that useth proverbs shall use this proverb against thee, saying, [r] As is the mother, so is her daughter.

45 Thou art thy mother's daughter, [s] that loatheth her husband and her children; and thou art the sister of thy sisters, which loathed their husbands and their children: [t] your mother was an Hittite, and your father an Amorite.

46 And thine [u] elder sister is Samaria, she and her daughters that dwell at thy left hand: [x] and * thy younger sister, that dwelleth at thy right hand, is Sodom and [y] her daughters.

47 Yet hast thou not walked after their ways, nor done after their abominations: but, † as if that were a very little thing, [z] thou wast corrupted more than they in all thy ways.

V. 35—43. The adulteress having been arraigned, and her guilt undeniably proved, the Judge proceeded to denounce sentence. For the enormous idolatries, cruelty, and persecution of Jerusalem and Judah, the Lord had determined to gather the surrounding nations, (both those with whom they had formed alliances, as the Egyptians and Assyrians; and such as had always been inimical to them, as Edom, Ammon, Moab, and Philistia,) to inflict or to witness, his judgments upon them. Before them he resolved to expose the crimes of the Jews, to strip them of all their privileges, and to put them to shame and contempt: as if a woman should be stripped naked, and publicly exposed; a punishment in some places inflicted on profligate women. Thus would he condemn them, as women used to be condemned for adultery, and for murdering their children: and he would execute the sentence with jealous indignation. He would give Jerusalem into the hand of the Chaldeans, who would throw down the city and temple which the Jews had polluted by idolatry; who would level their cities and high places with the ground; and who would slay, plunder, and enslave the people; and drive the remnant of them as naked captives before them. Thus they would serve Jerusalem as men used to deal with adulteresses, whom they stoned, slew with a sword, or otherwise put to death: they would burn all her palaces and edifices with fire, and make her an example to other cities and nations; as the death of an adulteress warned other women not to copy her crimes. Then would the fury of the Lord rest on Jerusalem: in this manner he would terminate her idolatries, and disable the Jews from building or endowing any more idol-temples: so should his justice be satisfied, and his jealousy subside; and having executed his purposes of vengeance, he would be quiet, and cease from his indignation. This intimates, that after the destruction of Jerusalem, the Lord would yet have mercy on the remnant of the nation. He would, however, certainly execute his vengeance upon them, for their ingratitude, because they had grieved and provoked their Benefactor by their crimes, and in order to destroy idolatry from among them. The old translation renders this perhaps more exactly,—"I have also brought thy way upon "thine head; yet thou hast not had consideration of all "thy abominations." 'I have punished thy faults; yet 'thou wouldst not repent.' The punishment of the adulteress, by stoning her, and thrusting her through with a sword, as compared with the subsequent intimations of mercy in reserve for her, keeps continually before the mind the meaning of the allegory, as relating to a collective body through succeeding generations; at some times exposed to divine judgments sweeping away vast numbers, and at other times the residue brought to repentance, and visited in mercy. So that, in expounding the chapter, it is very difficult to keep the allegory, and the thing signified by it, so distinct as it might be desired.

V. 44—47. They who framed or used sententious sayings, would make a proverb concerning Jerusalem, or apply an old proverb to her, and would say, "As is the "mother, so is her daughter;" intimating that the Jews were just such a people as the Hittites and Amorites whom they had supplanted had been: (3.) The Canaanites had early apostatized from the God of their fathers, and were among the first idolaters after the deluge: they had loathed and abhorred the worship of the Lord, and had burned their children in the fire to their idols. Though they had not been solemnly espoused to the Lord, as Israel was; yet he might, in some sense, be called their husband, especially when they first renounced his worship to follow their idols: and the Jews had copied exactly their conduct, in apostacy from God, idolatry, and cruelty to their children. Jerusalem had also copied the example of Samaria, called here her elder sister; because the kingdom of Israel was larger than that of Judah; and because Israel had led the way in open apostacy and idolatry, which Judah had followed. Nay, Jerusalem proved her relation to Sodom itself, which had been an inferior city and state, to the east of Jerusalem; for the Jews had copied the abominations of Sodom, and the other cities that had been destroyed with her. Nor must Jerusalem take umbrage a-

48 As I live, saith the Lord GOD, [a] Sodom thy sister hath not done, she nor her daughters, as thou hast done, thou and thy daughters.

49 Behold, this was the iniquity of thy sister Sodom, [b] pride, [c] fulness of bread, and abundance of idleness was in her, and in her daughters, [d] neither did she strengthen the hand of the poor and needy.

50 And they were haughty, [e] and committed abomination before me: [f] therefore I took them away as I saw good.

51 Neither hath [g] Samaria committed half of thy sins; but thou hast multiplied thine abominations more than they, and hast [h] justified thy sisters in all thine abominations which thou hast done.

52 Thou also, [i] which hast judged thy sisters, [h] bear thine own shame, for thy sins that thou hast committed more abominable than they: [l] they are more righteous than thou: yea, be thou confounded also, and bear thy shame, in that thou hast justified thy sisters.

53 When I shall [m] bring again their captivity, the captivity of Sodom and her daughters, and the captivity of Samaria and her daughters, then will I bring again the captivity of thy captives [n] in the midst of them:

54 That [o] thou mayest bear thine own shame, and mayest be confounded in all that thou hast done, [p] in that thou art a comfort unto them.

55 When thy sisters, Sodom and her daughters, shall return to their former estate, and Samaria and her daughters shall return to their former estate, [q] then thou and thy daughters shall return to your former estate.

56 For thy sister Sodom [r] was * not mentioned by thy mouth in the day of thy † pride.

57 Before [s] thy wickedness was discovered, as at the time of thy [t] reproach of the daughters of ‡ Syria, and all that are round about her, [u] the daughters of the Philistines, which § despise thee round about.

being considered as of the same family with Samaria and Sodom; seeing she thought it a small matter to imitate their crimes: but had improved upon them and exceeded them, as ambitious of pre-eminence and distinction in wickedness. The daughters of Samaria and Sodom, signify the cities and towns dependent on them. 'Samaria 'lay northward of Jerusalem, and Sodom southward, 'which two quarters of the world are expressed by the 'left and right, being placed in such a position to those 'that set their faces eastward.' (Lowth.)

V. 48—51. The Lord here confirmed it with a solemn oath, for fuller assurance that the sins of Sodom were not equal to those of Jerusalem. Being situated in a very fruitful country, the inhabitants of Sodom and the adjacent cities, grew proud of their wealth and prosperity, indulged in luxury and sensuality, and attended to nothing but present gratification, for which they had abundant leisure, not being constrained to labour for their bread. At the same time they neglected to protect and uphold the poor and needy, and probably their rulers oppressed and enslaved them. In short, they were proud and ungodly, and given up to unnatural lusts: and the Lord took them away by a tremendous judgment as he saw good. But they had not sinned against such clear light and abundant advantages, or with so many aggravations, as Jerusalem had done. Nor yet had Samaria stood it out against so many warnings and mercies, or multiplied idols, or persisted in idolatry in opposition to the efforts of many pious reforming kings, as Jerusalem had done. So that the conduct of the Jews tended to justify, or by comparison extenuate, the guilt of both Sodom and Samaria. 'Pride and luxury make men 'expensive in their own way of living, and regardless of 'the wants and miseries of others.' 'The ingratitude of 'Jerusalem was greater than that of Samaria; because 'God had placed his name there. She profaned the 'temple, by placing idols in it; which was a degree of 'idolatry beyond any thing that the ten tribes had been 'guilty of.' (Lowth.) It is highly worthy of notice, that want of charity to the poor should be mentioned among the crimes, which brought tremendous judgments on abandoned Sodom.

V. 52—55. The Jews had perhaps proudly judged and condemned the Samaritans and Sodomites, as justly punished: and yet their own conduct tended to justify them; for they had followed and far exceeded their abominations. As these two ruined cities had been more righteous than Jerusalem, could that city expect to escape the punishment due to her enormous crimes? Multitudes of the Jews would therefore be as dreadfully destroyed as the Sodomites had been; others would be dispersed and lost among the Gentiles, as the Israelites. Many of the Israelites would return with the Jews after the captivity; and many of the Jews would bear their shame by continuing in their dispersions. As they had kept the inhabitants of Sodom and Samaria in countenance by their crimes, and thus been a comfort to them: so Jerusalem should never be reinstated in her former glory, nor the Jews be wholly restored from their captivity, until Sodom and Samaria were restored likewise. This may mean, that they never would be thus restored: but it rather relates to the conversion of the Gentiles, who are frequently spoken of by the name of some nation, that was most given up to idolatry. Then, and not before, should the captivity of Judah be fully restored. This took place in part in the apostolical age: but its most signal accomplishment is yet future.

58 Thou [x] hast * borne thy lewdness and thine abominations, saith the LORD.

59 For thus saith the Lord GOD; [y] I will even deal with thee as thou hast done, [z] which hast despised the oath in breaking the covenant.

60 ¶ Nevertheless, [a] I will remember my covenant with thee in the days of thy youth, and [b] I will establish unto thee an everlasting covenant.

61 Then thou shalt [c] remember thy ways, and be ashamed, [d] when thou shalt receive thy sisters, thine elder and thy younger: and [e] I will give them unto thee for daughters, [f] but not by thy covenant.

62 And [g] I will establish my covenant with thee; [h] and thou shalt know that I am the LORD:

63 That thou mayest [i] remember, and be confounded, [k] and never open thy mouth any more because of thy shame, [l] when I am pacified toward thee for all that thou hast done, saith the Lord GOD.

V. 56—59. Either the Jews entirely overlooked the example set before them in the desolations of Sodom; or, being proud of their privileges and prosperity, they would have disdained to mention so infamous a place, especially as standing in any near relation to them. This was peculiarly the case, before the iniquity of the Jews was discovered, by the punishments inflicted on them, during the invasions of the land by the Syrians and Philistines in the reign of Ahaz: but at that time the Gentiles reproached and despised the Jews, as a most abominable people. These, and other judgments had come upon them for their idolatries, of which they had openly borne the shame: but the Lord meant further to deal with them after their deserts, especially in violating their covenant-engagements, which they had so solemnly ratified, but now despised as of no value or obligation.

V. 60—63. The Lord did not, however, intend finally to cast off the whole people of Israel. Of his mere mercy and abundant grace, he would remember his covenant with Abraham and Israel, and even that made with the nation at mount Sinai: and he would establish with them a better and more enduring covenant. If this at all refer to the return of the Jews from Babylon; no doubt it more directly predicts the conversion of Jews and Gentiles to Christ, and their future restoration to the Church, when the fulness of the Gentiles also shall come in. At these periods, the Jews would remember, and be ashamed of their former evil ways; they would willingly receive into communion with them the worst of the heathen, when converted to Christ; the Lord would then give unto Jerusalem for daughters, those very persons whom she had disdained to acknowledge as sisters; that is, the Gentile converts would be brought into God's family, as the children of his ancient Church. This would not be effected by the national covenant made with Israel; but by the new covenant of grace in the hands of Christ our Mediator; a covenant established upon better promises, and they would then indeed know the Lord. All these events would concur in humbling them for their sins; and they would then remember all their shameful behaviour to their merciful God; which would cover them with confusion, and silence their boasts of being the peculiar and exclusive favourites of heaven; their complaints of the Lord's dealings with them; their self-justification, and their revilings and contemptuous abuse of the poor Gentiles. When the Lord had shown himself reconciled to them, they would scarcely be able to forgive themselves, and would only have their mouths open before him in humble confessions and fervent prayers, praises, and thanksgivings. This seems particularly to refer to the case of the Jews, at their future conversion to their long rejected Messiah; when their former enmity will effectually silence their proud boastings: but it may be applied to new converts, to returning backsliders, and to true believers, who are thus instructed and disciplined by their daily experience. The conclusion of this remarkable chapter clearly predicts the abolition of the Sinai-covenant, the introduction of a new dispensation, and the union of Jews and Gentiles in the Church of Christ; events, against which the Jews, in the time of our Lord and his apostles, entertained the most invincible prejudices. "They erred, not "knowing the Scriptures."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

N. B. The peculiar arrangement of these Practical Observations, renders it impossible to divide them according to the verses of the chapter; the distinct subjects therefore are only separated by a break.

As men are with great difficulty made sensible of their heinous guilt, and as this conviction is absolutely necessary to repentance and faith in Christ: so it is the duty of ministers frequently to set before them their sins, with all the aggravations of them, as the appointed means of this humiliation. None are with more difficulty convinced of their abominations than hypocrites; nor should any be reproved and exposed with so great severity and abhorrence. Human depravity is most evident in the wickedness of those who have been most favoured with the means of becoming holy, and in the similarity, hitherto very observable betwixt the visible Church and the rest of the world; except as the former hath produced the most monstrous abominations! Jerusalem hath too generally appeared to be the daughter of the Amorite and the Hittite, and the sister of Samaria and Sodom. If we could survey the Christian Church, in all the various forms and places in which it hath been established in different ages, we should have a picture before us not much more attractive than this of the nation of Israel: though there hath always been, in both of them, "a remnant according to the election of "grace," whose pious and quiet lives have not been much noticed in history. Otherwise, the annals of the Church are the most melancholy subject that can be contemplated. Let us turn our thoughts to the first establishment of Christianity in the Gentile world, and especially in the Roman empire. The state of the Gentiles was indeed such as rendered them a loathsome object in the eyes of a holy God; yet in a time of pity and love he passed by, and said to them, as they lay perishing in sin and pollution, "Live, "yea, he said unto them, Live." He planted his Gospel among them, and caused Christians to multiply exceedingly. At length the Roman emperors becoming Christians, the Church grew great and honourable; Christianity became the established religion; abundance of liberty and encouragement was given to its preachers and professors; the places for public worship were multiplied, decorated, and enriched by ample donations and endowments, and the Church prospered into a kingdom. But what were the consequences? The pride, ambition, rapacity, and licentiousness; the furious contests and cruel persecutions; the superstitions, blasphemies, impostures, and idolatries, which came in, and continued to increase for ages, at length rendered the Christian Roman empire a genuine daughter of the Pagan Roman empire; and all that used proverbs might well say, "As was the mother so is the "daughter." Nor was there ever a heathen city or kingdom on the face of the earth, whose iniquities, cruelties, and unnatural lusts, whose whoredom and adultery, corporal and spiritual, have not been justified, and far exceeded, by the Church of Rome, and her dependencies, which long formed so large a part of Christendom, as to give occasion to her assuming the arrogant title of the Holy Catholic Church!

If we turn our attention to the reformed and protestant Churches, which were brought forth out of this antichristian community, in a low, feeble, and despised condition, (as Israel was out of Egypt:) we shall again find cause of lamentation and shame. When they were ready to be overwhelmed in infancy by the merciless power of their enemies, and seemed to have no helper; when they were still polluted with many of the errors and superstitions of that Church, from which they had separated, as well as with other corruptions; the Lord in a time of love looked upon them, and said to them, Live: he rescued them from their oppressors, increased them abundantly, reduced them to some regular order, afforded them abundant means of grace, took them under his protection, espoused them to himself, and they became his. And he continued to purify, instruct, prosper, and adorn them with eminent and excellent ministers and writers, until they became very "renowned among the nations, through the comeliness "which the LORD had put upon them." But though they have not run into the gross outward idolatries and enormities of the church of Rome; yet they have become proud of their beauty, and have played the harlot. In many places, forms, creeds, and establishments, are nearly the whole of what is left of their former excellency; and this dead carcass they idolize: in others infidelity and skepticism have discarded even the forms of truth and godliness. In covetousness, pride, luxury, and every worldly lust, they have grievously been guilty of idolatry: in impiety, perfidy, perjury, and licentiousness, many of them have vied with Rome herself: and though more free from the blood of persecution, yet the blood shed by unjust wars and cruel oppressions in different parts of the globe, from a sordid love of gain, renders the daughter too much like her base and abominable mother. It is not necessary to expatiate further on the painful topic; the inference is obvious and unavoidable: no outward forms can change the propensity of man's heart to depart from God and rebel against him; but they often give it occasion to rage more vehemently. Whatever nation professing Christianity, whatever sect of Christians, we accurately survey, we shall soon perceive traces of the same spirit which led Israel into all their abominations.

Again, if we consider the subject with reference to ourselves, we shall here too find it applicable. When we recollect the mercies of God our Creator in giving us our being and rational powers; in protecting us in helpless infancy and bringing us to maturity; in supplying all our wants, and vouchsafing us innumerable benefits; we cannot but remember, at the same time, that we have been forgetful of him, and ungrateful and rebellious in numberless instances. How have we abused his bounty, in making provision for our pride and lusts! How have many of us proceeded from one iniquity to another, as we had time and opportunity! How have we stood it out against warnings, corrections, and convictions, and gone on in sin, though evidently exposed by it to manifold losses, troubles, and sorrows! And should we not have still continued in the same course, through our idolatrous attachment to worldly objects, and our aversion to the spiritual service of God, if we had been left to ourselves? Should we not indeed have done still worse, if our restraints had been removed, and we could have gratified our inclinations without fear or shame? Many have been educated amidst good instructions and edifying examples, and for a time have made some profession of religion: yet the lusts of their hearts have broken through all these obstacles, and hurried them away into apostacy, infidelity, and open wickedness. In various ways, the same cause produces similar effects, and it is evinced that we are all conceived and born in sin, carnally minded, and enmity against God.

And if we take a view even of true believers, we shall not fail to discover abundant evidence of the same mortifying truth. They know, that they were by nature children of wrath, even as others: they were depraved and polluted, and of the same original propensities as Amorites and Hittites. As they grew up, their innate depravity brought forth its fruit in their words and actions, and proved them to be deserving of God's indignation, and meet objects of his loathing and abhorrence. Unless He had saved them, they must have perished, without help or pity; and they had no claim on him: so that they were "cast out to the loathing of their persons, from the day "that they were born." But in a time of love and mercy, the Lord passed by them, when they lay in this polluted and perishing condition: "of his great love, wherewith he "loved them, even when they were dead in sin," he said unto them, Live, and saved them by his grace: he rescued them from the power of Satan, brought them to repentance and faith in Christ, forgave their sins, and took them into covenant with himself, and they became his people. Thus were they "washed, and sanctified, and justified, in the "name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God;" they were consecrated to him by this sacred unction; they were clothed with the robes of righteousness and salvation, enriched with the unsearchable riches of Christ, adorned with heavenly graces and privileges; and the God of Heaven became unto them both a Father and a Husband: it is his good pleasure to give them the kingdom, and they are made the excellent of the earth, "through the comeliness "which he puts upon them." Far be it from us to suppose, that many of those, who have been thus favoured and blessed, return to the habitual practice of any gross wickedness: but, alas! too often, even in them, pride and the carnal mind recover much force; they backslide from God, and pursue worthless vanities and idols. Some few have been left to fall from one evil to another, in a most awful manner, to show whither the bent of their hearts would carry them, if left to themselves, and if they should cease to watch and pray. Others have in an unguarded hour given such cause to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme, as hath embittered all their future days. And even they who walk most uniformly in the Lord's ways, are conscious of such inward workings of pride and ambition; of such strong propensities to worldly objects; of such forgetfulness of God and ingratitude to him, and such rebellion against his appointments; of such unfaithfulness, unprofitableness, and want of love and zeal; of such weakness of heart and strength of passions; as render them daily more and more sensible that they equally need, and are equally unworthy of, the Lord's mercy, with the most profligate of their neighbours. They have "the witness "in themselves" continually, that they are naturally no better than others, and that all the difference in their state, character, hopes, and prospects, arises from the mere mercy and grace of God. They look upon those who are living without God in the world, in pride, idleness, luxury, licentiousness, and cruel oppression of the poor and needy, and are humbly sensible, that it hath been the Lord's doing, that they were not left to live, die, and perish in the same manner. They look at apostates and hypocrites, at proud Pharisees and prouder infidels; and in condemning them, they condemn themselves; for such they have been, or were disposed to be. And though, through grace, they now are not such; yet they so often sin against light and love, that their conduct seems to themselves equally aggravated, even when no eye, but that of God and their enlightened consciences, can see any thing culpable. This disposes them to justify God in all his corrections, which they find to be indispensably necessary for them, and to thank him for them: and whilst they adore his justice in the final destruction of impenitent sinners, they have nothing to say in their own behalf; but feel, that, though more favoured, they are no more deserving. Thus the new convert remembers, and is confounded whilst he reviews the iniquities of his past life, and discovers the enmity of his heart against God and his word. The experienced believer is ashamed and confounded, whilst he reviews the evils of his heart and life, even since he was brought acquainted with the Gospel; and his mouth is stopped from impatient murmurs, proud boastings, severe censures, and self-justification: and the more he is satisfied that the Lord is "pacified to him for all "that he hath done," the more is he ashamed of his ingratitude and rebellion against so merciful a God and Saviour. This temper of mind distinguishes the true Christian from all other men: the Lord will bring all those to it, with whom he establishes his everlasting covenant; and will render them willing to be saved in the same way with the vilest outward offenders, and to receive them, when penitent, as their brethren in Christ Jesus. All others will have their mouths stopped in the day of judgment; and God will glorify himself, and satisfy his justice in their punishment.

But let us rejoice, that, as the Lord would not break his covenant with his ancient servants, because of all the abominations of their descendants; so he will never forsake his Church, with whom he hath made a new covenant, established upon better promises; nor will he ever leave the sinner to perish, who is humbled for his sins, and comes to trust in his mercy and grace through Jesus Christ; but will keep him by his power through faith unto salvation.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVII. V. 2. A riddle. That is, an emblematic representation, which requires attention and ingenuity to unravel it, but which aptly and elegantly depictures the transactions intended by it. This riddle seems to have been put forth about the time when Zedekiah was devising to revolt from the king of Babylon, and to form an alliance with the king of Egypt.

V. 3, 4. (11, 12.) Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, was described under the emblem of a great eagle, because of his towering ambition, and his preying on all his neighbours. The great and long wings of this eagle denoted the extent of his dominions, both in length and 5 He took also of [f] the seed of the land, and * planted it in a fruitful field; [g] he placed it by great waters, and set it as a willow tree.

6 And [h] it grew, and became a spreading vine of low stature, whose branches turned toward him, and the roots thereof were under him: so it became a vine, and brought forth branches, and shot forth sprigs.

7 There was also [i] another great eagle with great wings and many feathers: and, behold, this vine did bend her roots toward him, and shot forth her branches toward him, that he might water it by the furrows of her plantation.

8 It was planted in a good † soil by great waters, that it might bring forth branches, and that it might bear fruit, that it might be a goodly vine.

9 Say thou, Thus saith the Lord GOD; [k] Shall it prosper? [l] shall he not pull up the roots thereof, and cut off the fruit thereof, that it wither? it shall wither in all the leaves of her spring, [m] even without great power, or many people to pluck it up by the roots thereof.

10 Yea, behold, being planted, shall it prosper? [n] shall it not utterly wither, when the east wind toucheth it? it shall wither in the furrows where it grew.

11 ¶ Moreover the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

12 Say now [o] to the rebellious house, [p] Know ye not what these things mean? tell them, [q] Behold, the king of Babylon is come to Jerusalem, and hath taken the king thereof, and the princes thereof, [r] and led them with him to Babylon;

13 And [s] hath taken of the king's seed, and made a covenant with him, and hath ‡ taken an oath of him: [t] he hath also taken the mighty of the land:

14 That [u] the kingdom might be base, that it might not lift itself up, ◊ but that [x] by keeping of his covenant it might stand.

breadth: the feathers of divers colours signified, that he ruled over many countries abounding in people and riches, and of different languages and manners. This eagle came to Lebanon, and cropped off the highest branch of a cedar: that is, Nebuchadnezzar came to Jerusalem, and seized on Jeconiah, of the ancient and honourable family of David. And though he was the highest branch of the cedar, the heir of David's crown: yet, being very young, and newly raised to the throne, in a very enfeebled state of the kingdom, he was no more able to resist the victor, than the tender twig would be to resist the eagle. He therefore carried him and his princes to Babylon, which was become a city of merchants in a land of traffic, being very prosperous under the rule of Nebuchadnezzar. The word rendered traffic, is Canaan, which signifies trade or merchandise. (Zech. xiv. 21. John ii. 16.)

V. 5, 6. The word, rendered a willow-tree, is translated by many, very circumspectly. Nebuchadnezzar took every precaution to prevent Zedekiah's revolting from him. (Marg. Ref.) (12, 13.) The conqueror did not further oppress or enslave the Jews, nor place over them any of his own princes: but he took Mattaniah of the family of David, Josiah's younger son, the uncle of Jeconiah; and having engaged him by covenant and by a solemn oath in the name of JEHOVAH, to be faithful to him; and having changed his name to Zedekiah, which signifies the righteousness of JEHOVAH, he made him king over the Jewish nation. Thus he planted of the seed of the land in a fruitful field, as a willow flourishes when planted by great waters. And though the kingdom was depressed and dependent; yet Zedekiah's situation was so favourable, and the conditions granted him so moderate, that by keeping of the covenant, it might have stood. Indeed for a time this twig grew, and became a spreading vine of low stature: and so long as Zedekiah and his princes were willing to depend on and submit to the king of Babylon, the Jews enjoyed peace and recovered strength, and Zedekiah prospered in his kingdom and family.

V. 7, 8. The other great eagle was Pharaoh-hophra king of Egypt, who was as ambitious and rapacious as Nebuchadnezzar, but not so powerful. This eagle had great wings and many feathers; but not equal to those of the other eagle. Yet the vine bent its roots, and shot its branches towards it; in order to be watered by the furrows of its plantation. Many suppose that this refers to the inundations of the Nile, and the manner in which Egypt was watered. Zedekiah planned a revolt from the king of Babylon, and entered into an alliance with the king of Egypt; either hoping to recover independence by his assistance; or preferring to be his vassal rather than Nebuchadnezzar's, as expecting greater prosperity and security under him. But he had no sufficient or even plausible reason for this conduct; being already in such a situation as would have enabled him to reign in credit, and to be useful to his people.

V. 9, 10. (15—21.) It could not be expected that the vine should prosper: the eagle that planted it would certainly root it up, destroy all its fruit, and cause all its leaves to wither, even in the spring when other trees looked green: and this would be done very easily, as a small force suffices to pull up a newly planted vine by the roots. Though it had been carefully planted and was well watered, yet it would soon wither in its place, as a tree by the blast of the unwholesome east wind.

V. 12. Know, &c. 'Will ye not apply your minds 'to understand what God speaks to you? and that, whe-'ther he direct his speech to you in plain words, or in 'riddles and parables?' (Lowth.)

15 But [y] he rebelled against him [z] in sending his ambassadors into Egypt, that they might give him horses and much people. [a] Shall he prosper? [b] shall he escape that doeth such things? [c] or shall he break the covenant, and be delivered?

16 As I live, saith the Lord GOD, surely in the place where the king dwelleth that made him king, [d] whose oath he despised and whose covenant he brake, [e] even with him in the midst of Babylon he shall die.

17 Neither [f] shall Pharaoh, with his mighty army and great company, make for him in the war, [g] by casting up mounts, and building forts, to cut off many persons:

18 Seeing he despised the oath by breaking the covenant, when, [h] lo, he had given his hand, and hath done all these things, [i] he shall not escape.

19 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD; As I live, [k] surely mine oath that he hath despised, and my covenant that he hath broken, even it will I recompense upon his own head.

20 And [l] I will spread my net upon him, and he shall be taken in my snare, and I will bring him to Babylon, and will [m] plead with him there, for his trespass that he hath trespassed against me.

21 And [n] all his fugitives with all his bands shall fall by the sword, and they that remain shall be scattered toward all winds; and ye [o] shall know that I the LORD have spoken it.

22 ¶ Thus saith the Lord GOD; I will also take of [p] the highest branch of the high cedar, and will set it; I will crop off from the top of his young twigs [q] a tender one, and will plant it [r] upon an high mountain and eminent.

23 In the mountain of the height of Israel will I plant it: [s] and it shall bring forth boughs, and bear fruit, and be a goodly cedar: and [t] under it shall dwell all fowl of every wing; in the shadow of the branches thereof shall they dwell.

24 And [u] all the trees of the field shall know, that I the LORD [x] have brought down the high tree, have exalted the low tree, have dried up the green tree, and have made the dry tree to flourish: [y] I the LORD have spoken, and have done it.

V. 13, 14. Notes, 3—6. (Marg. Ref.)

Mights, &c. 'As hostages for the performance of the covenants agreed on between him and Zedekiah.' (Lowth.)

—Base. Or low. It is the same word before used, (6.) A tributary kingdom dependent on the king of Babylon; and so Zedekiah was in less honourable circumstances than his predecessors. Submission, however, to Providence would have been his duty, even if he had not engaged by covenant and oath to be faithful to Nebuchadnezzar.

V. 15—21. Zedekiah and his people expected to prosper by their worldly policy; but would God permit such perfidy and perjury to go unpunished? He had given the power into Nebuchadnezzar's hand: Zedekiah had accepted the kingdom upon the terms proposed to him, and had ratified the covenant with a solemn oath: and then he hesitated not to break it, that he might form an alliance with another heathen king! And ought he to escape punishment, who did such things? or to be delivered by his base perfidy? The Lord therefore sware by himself, as the living God, (whom Zedekiah had called to witness, when he swore allegiance to the king of Babylon,) that he should die in captivity at Babylon; especially for despising his oath, and breaking his covenant. Nor should Pharaoh, whose formidable preparations threatened the destruction of the Chaldeans, do Zedekiah any good, but should rather occasion the destruction of greater numbers of the Jews; for the Lord himself would fight against them to their ruin. (xii. 13, 14.) Though Zedekiah's oath had been given to a heathen, a conqueror, and a tyrant; and many plausible reasons might have been assigned for violating it: yet God considered Zedekiah's conduct as a great sin against him, and was determined to punish him for it. What shall we then say to the maxim, that faith is not to be kept with heretics?

V. 22—24. The Lord would not, however, forget his engagements to the family of David, whilst he punished this degenerate branch of it. He would plant a tender shoot cropped from the highest branch of this high cedar. Some refer this to Zerubbabel, who ruled over the Jews after the captivity: but if he were at all meant, it could only be as a type of Christ. This plant was first at his incarnation apparently a tender one, but after his humiliation, sufferings, and death, he was exalted to the right hand of the Father, and made "Head over all things to "his Church;" and thus became a Plant of renown. The high and eminent mountain, on which he was planted, signified the Christian Church, of which mount Zion was the type. There he grows, as the living Vine, or as the stately Cedar, or both in one, and all his people are united to him, and live in him. Under the shadow and among the branches of this tree, dwell all fowl of every wing: that is, sinners of every nation, rank, and character find refuge in Christ. And all the inhabitants of the earth, and especially the rulers of it, will know the power, truth, justice, and love of God, in these events; in bringing down the kingdom of David, when it was exalted, and withering it when it flourished; and then in exalting it from its depressed state, and causing it to flourish when it

CHAP. XVIII.

God reproves the Jews for the proverb of sour grapes, 1—4. He shows his dealings with a righteous man, 5—9; with the wicked son of a righteous father, 10—13; and with the righteous son of a wicked father, 14—18. He will deal with each individual according to his character, 19—21. The wicked, if he repent, shall live, 21—23; and the righteous, if he apostatize, shall die, 24. He shows the equity of his dealings, and the iniquity of the Jews, 25—29. He earnestly exhorts them to repent, in the prospect of being judged according to their ways, 30—32.

THE word of the LORD came unto me again, saying,

2 What [b] mean ye, that ye use this proverb concerning [b] the land of Israel, saying, [c] The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge?

was withered. Or the high and green tree may refer to the kingdom of Babylon, and all those other kingdoms, which have been, and will be, destroyed, to make way for the kingdom of Christ. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The greatest exploits of mighty conquerors, when impartially represented, resemble the ravages of birds and beasts of prey; except as their power and success render them more extensively destructive, and as they alone devour their own species. But they are employed by a righteous God, to perform a part of his grand design; and till their work be done, they prosper in their enterprises. It is more desirable to be like a spreading vine of low stature which brings forth fruit, than to prosper in doing evil: and if we be planted in the courts of the Lord, if our branches turn towards him, and our roots draw nourishment from him, we shall be "like a tree planted by the "rivers of waters, which bringeth forth its fruit in due "season." And should we be kept poor and obscure, and live hardly by honest industry, we shall notwithstanding be more comfortable, as well as more useful, than the most successful of the ungodly. But they who depart from God, can only vary and multiply their crimes, by exchanging one carnal confidence for another: and, notwithstanding their fair prospects and sunguine hopes, they never can attain to durable prosperity. Princes and politicians are apt to trifle with solemn oaths and treaties, and to devise specious pretences for violating them: but the Lord will not hold them guiltless who thus take his name in vain: and few of them will be able to plead more plausibly for perfidy and perjury, than Zedekiah might have done; against whom these awful threatenings were denounced, for breaking his covenant with the king of Babylon, and despising the oath sworn to him. Rulers and nations seldom prosper, who commit atrocious crimes; but no man shall escape the righteous judgment of God, who dies under the unrepented guilt of such iniquity and impiety: for as sure as the Lord liveth, he will recompense them upon the sinner's head; and the sinful methods which men take of extricating themselves out of difficulties, are sure to entangle them in snares and nets, to their greater misery or ruin. Blessed be God, our Redeemer, to whom all the prophets bare witness, differs wholly from these degenerate branches of the family of David. His word is truth, his arm is power, and his heart is love. He is planted upon a high and eminent mountain, that he may be conspicuous even to the ends of the earth: he is loaded with most precious fruit; sinners of every name find refuge from the wrath to come, and from every enemy and danger, under his shadow; and believers not only partake of his precious fruits, but are also made fruitful by him: yea, many of them are "filled "with all the fruits of righteousness, which are through "him to the praise and glory of God the Father." May every power, however flourishing and exalted, which opposes his cause, be brought low and withered; may his kingdom be exalted and prosper; and may the whole earth behold, and be filled with, his glory. Amen, and Amen.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVIII. V. 2. (Note, Jer. xxxi. 29, 30.) God had declared, both in the law and by the prophets, that he would punish the sins of the fathers upon the children unto several generations. He had traced back the ruin of the ten tribes to the idolatry of Jeroboam, who made Israel to sin, by establishing the worship of the golden calves; and he had charged the ruin of Judah on the sins of Manasseh. This was originally intended as an additional preservative from iniquity, especially from idolatry, which was likely to descend to their posterity, and entail judgments on them: it was an argument of the Lord's patience; for he would not immediately cast off his people, upon the first forfeiture of the covenant. It referred entirely to temporal calamities; and supposed that the generation on whom divine judgments were executed, imitated or exceeded the sins of their parents. 'God 'expressly threatens to visit the sins of the fathers upon 'the children, both in the Old and New Testament, (Marg. 'Ref.) but this is only to be understood with respect to 'the temporal punishments of this world, not with re'spect to the eternal punishments of the next.' (Lowth.) —'The Scripture takes notice of a certain measure of 'iniquity, which is filling up from one generation to 'another; till at last it makes a nation or family ripe for 'destruction. And although these persons on whom this 'vengeance falls, suffer no more than their own personal 'sins deserved; yet, because the sins of former generations, 'which they equal or outdo, make it time for God utterly 'to destroy them, the punishment due to the sins of many 'generations are said to fall upon them.' (Sherlock.) But the Jews, being proudly disposed to justify themselves, and impiously to arraign the divine conduct, spake and acted, as if they had been free from guilt, and suffered wholly for their father's sins: whereas their abominations far exceeded those of any former generation of Israel. With a mixture therefore of profaneness and wit, they invented a proverb, which soon came into common use. This implied that wickedness indeed merited punishment, and suffering might be expected as the effect of sin; even as the teeth being set on edge was the ordinary consequence of eating sour grapes: but that it was their hard case that their fathers had enjoyed the pleasure, (such as it was) of committing sin, and they had the pain of being punished for it: as if their guilty parents had wholly escaped with impunity; and as if themselves had been entirely blameless.

V. 3, 4. In the most solemn manner, the Lord assured the people, that he would bring this proverb into entire disuse, by exposing their crimes to public view, at the time when he executed vengeance upon them. It was absurd, as well as profane, to suppose, that he would punish the innocent instead of the guilty; seeing he had, as Creator, a sovereign right and power to deal with all men as he pleased. The life or soul of one man was as much regarded by him as that of another: he had the soul of the father as absolutely at his disposal as that of the son; and he could have no motive for letting the one escape with impunity, in order to punish the other in his stead. But "the soul that sinneth it shall die." According to the law, death, temporal and eternal, is the wages of every sin: and the impenitent sinner remains under this condemnation notwithstanding the Gospel.—Some commentators explain this of the temporal death which was about to come on the wicked Jews, by sword, famine, and pestilence; and they would confine the whole chapter to these events. But it cannot be proved, that every righteous man escaped those temporal judgments, or that all who survived them were righteous: without which the whole interpretation must fall for want of a foundation, (xxi. 3, 4.) Many indeed of the pious Jews had "their lives given to them for a prey;" but even what Jeremiah, Baruch, and others endured, in the siege and after the taking of Jerusalem, nearly equalled the external sufferings of many wicked men among them; and none of those who survived the siege, escaped captivity or exile. So that facts, in this particular, did not so fully ascertain the equality of the divine conduct towards these distinct characters, as this hypothesis requires. The miseries that the infants suffered during the siege; and the circumstances of such of them as survived and grew up in captivity, and at a great distance from the estates and comforts, which otherwise they would have inherited, demonstrate, that in temporal things the children actually did suffer for the sins of their parents, even though they did not imitate their crimes, nay, when they were themselves righteous persons. The same has always been the case as to temporal things: nor can even infidels deny the stubborn facts which prove, that the crimes of parents entail sufferings on their children. Indeed it must be allowed by men of all creeds and systems. Instead therefore of temporal dispensations being all that is intended in this remarkable chapter; it is evident that these were not at all meant, or in a very subordinate manner; for though Israel, as a nation, was under a peculiar dispensation as to temporal prosperity and adversity; yet it appears from various testimonies of the Old Testament, that individuals were not uniformly prospered or afflicted, according to their characters. (Ps. lxxiii. Eccles. ix. 1, 2.) But in the great concerns of eternity every man was, is, and will be, dealt with according as his works evince him to have been under the old covenant of works, or the new covenant of grace; which is enough for the entire justification of the divine conduct, whatever temporal calamities men endure, through the sins of others: seeing they deserve for their own sins more than all which they thus suffer; and the Lord over-rules every event for the eternal good of believers. The use of the singular number, through the whole of this argument, tends also to confirm this sentiment: as the case of individuals, and not that of the nation at large, was evidently intended.

V. 5—9. Some expositors explain these verses, as merely 10 ¶ If he beget a son [x] that is * a robber, [y] a shedder of blood, and that doeth † the like to any one of these things, relating to a man's outward conduct, which entitled him to exemption from national judgments: but external good behaviour, while the heart remains unchanged and at enmity against God, is hypocrisy; and God would never thus solemnly have pronounced a mere hypocrite righteous, or entitled to any reward. (Matt. vi. 1, 2. xxiii. 25—28.) On the other hand, the way of justification before God is not the subject; nor yet the source of the discrimination which takes place in men's characters, who are all of the same fallen nature. But it is taken for granted, that there are righteous persons on earth; and their character and conduct are described; which is very commonly done both in the Old and the New Testament. The upright servant of God, that is, the true believer, would do justice and judgment; for the divine law would be the rule of his conduct. Reverential fear and love of God would keep him from eating of the sacrifices, offered upon the mountains to idols: and he would bring his oblations in penitent faith to the temple; and there feast on his peace-offerings with a thankful heart. He would not lift up his eyes in adoration of the base idols, which the house of Israel madly worshipped. So far from committing adultery, he would consult expediency, and obey the law of God, even in lawful marriage. He would by no means oppress the poor, by retaining their pledges, or exacting usury contrary to the law, or by fraud or violence: he would not only be strictly and conscientiously honest; but he would liberally contribute to the necessities of the needy: he would use his influence and authority to execute justice betwixt man and man; habitually walk in God's ordinances and commandments, stand at a distance from all kind of iniquity, and act uniformly as the spiritual worshipper and devoted servant of the Lord. They who speak as if a man might do all this, without faith or special grace, unwarily concede more to those who deny man's total depravity than they intend. Such a course of conduct formed, under that dispensation, the proper evidence of a man's conversion, and that he was a true believer and an heir of eternal life. Indeed the New Testament scarcely affords a more distinguishing description of the believer's conduct to God and man. As, therefore, "He that doeth righteousness is "born of God;" and "He that doeth righteousness is "righteous;" and as living faith is known by its fruits, and distinguished from a dead faith; so God would certainly adjudge him whose character, in his sight, answered to this description, to be a righteous man, and an heir of eternal life. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10—13. If this very man, who so satisfactorily had shown his faith by his works, had a son, whose character and conduct was the reverse of his father's; which might be the case, notwithstanding the good example set, and the good instructions given him: if he were a robber, a murderer, an adulterer, or idolater, an oppressor, or usurer, or guilty of other abominations: could it be expected that he should escape the vengeance of God on account of his father's piety? Surely no: though he might for a time fare better for it in this world; yet he would at length perish with deeper aggravation, and have none but himself to blame for his destruction. 'The cause of his 'ruin is in himself.' Josiah was an eminently righteous father, whose children were notoriously wicked; yet the difference as to this world was not so great between him and them, as to accord to the vast difference in their character. He died in battle at the age of thirty-nine; and Jehoiakim, the most wicked of his sons, was slain at the age of thirty-six: but the one died in peace and went to glory; the other was cut off in his sins.

V. 14—17. It seems peculiarly absurd to explain this of the single generation of Israel in which the prophet lived, and of the temporal judgments that awaited them; when a succession of generations is expressly supposed in the illustrations given of the divine conduct. Should such a wicked man, as had been described, have a son, who, witnessing his father's sins, instead of imitating them, duly considered the evil of them: and so was led conscientiously to avoid them, and to walk before God as the righteous man before described did; relaxing even the hard impositions that had been laid upon the poor by his father.

18 As for his father, because he cruelly oppressed, spoiled his brother by violence, and did that which is not good among his people, lo, [q] even he shall die in his iniquity.

19 Yet say ye, [r] Why? doth not the son bear the iniquity of the father? [s] When the son hath done that which is lawful and right, and hath kept all my statutes, and hath done them, he shall surely live.

20 The [t] soul that sinneth, it shall die. The son shall not [u] bear the iniquity of the father, neither shall the father bear the iniquity of the son: [x] the righteousness of the righteous shall be upon him, and the wickedness of the wicked shall be upon him.

21 ¶ But [y] if the wicked will turn from all his sins that he hath committed, [z] and keep all my statutes, [a] and do that which is lawful and right, [b] he shall surely live, he shall not die.

22 All [c] his transgressions that he hath committed, they shall not be mentioned unto him: [d] in his righteousness that he hath done he shall live.

23 Have [e] I any pleasure at all that the wicked should die? saith the Lord GOD; and [f] not that he should return from his ways, and live?

as soon as he had it in his power: this man would by no means perish for his father's sins. If indeed he lived in a time of public calamity, he could not avoid many temporal evils; and he might perhaps suffer famine, poverty, or captivity; or, "be taken away from the evil to come:" but as a true believer, "a doer of the word, he would be blessed "in his deed," and his soul would finally be saved. (Marg. Ref.) Thus Hezekiah considered the sins of his father Ahaz; and his whole character was a perfect contrast to that of his father.

V. 19, 20. Notwithstanding this condescension of the Lord, in explaining his dealings to the people, he foresaw they would still object, that it was evident the son did bear the iniquity of the father. To this he answered, that the son who had not copied his father's sins, but had lived a godly life, should surely be saved; and that they only should perish who had themselves deserved it. 'He that doeth righteously 'shall be graciously accepted; he that doeth evil shall re-'ceive according to the wickedness he hath committed.' (Bp. Hall.) (Notes, Is. iii. 10, 11. Rom. ii. 7—11.) Let it again be observed, that the question here is not about the meritorious ground of justification, but about the Lord's dealings with the righteous and the wicked. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 21, 22. In order to evince more undeniably the mercy, as well as the equity, of the Lord's dealings with his creatures, it is here further declared, that the wicked man himself, if he turned from his evil ways, would certainly be saved. (Note, iii. 18, 19.) 'If that man, who 'hath been formerly wicked, shall now prove truly peni-'tent, and turn from all his sins, and live holily, he 'shall surely live and not die.' (Bp. Hall.) 'He joineth 'the observation of the commandments with repentance; 'for no man can repent indeed, except he labour to keep 'the law.' The true penitent is also a true believer; and as to the grand question of acceptance with God unto eternal life, none of his former transgressions shall be any more mentioned unto him; but in the righteousness which he hath done, as the fruit of faith and the effect of conversion, he shall surely live. How enervated does it render the passage, to explain it, that his sins should not be mentioned against him to his temporal punishment, though they might to his eternal damnation!

V. 23. 'Is it any pleasure to me, that men should 'be wicked; or that those which are now wicked men 'should die everlastingly? Is it not rather my desire that 'men should repent, and that the repentant should live? 'Is not this the very sum of my Gospel, which I send 'into the world? Do I not call, and cry, and sue to men, 'that they would return from their sins, and be saved?' (Bp. Hall.) This is sufficient to encourage the humble penitent and to silence the obstinate rebel: and these are condescending methods of illustrating the divine dispensations, by a reference to human affairs. The original may be rendered, "Do I greatly delight that the wicked "should die? saith the Lord GOD; and do I not greatly "delight that he should return from his ways and live?" God doth greatly delight in showing mercy to the penitent: (Marg. Ref.) he greatly approves their repentance, and takes pleasure in their happiness; but he abhors the conduct of the impenitent, and punishes them, not because he delights in their misery, but for the display of his own glory, and the general good of his universal and everlasting kingdom. The most clement and benevolent prince finds it necessary and incumbent on him, to punish with death those criminals who endanger the safety of the state and the peace and happiness of his loyal subjects: but it is a painful duty, while he feels much pleasure in the good conduct of his people, and in showing mercy, as far as it can be done with propriety. Whereas, there have been many tyrants, who have delighted in the crimes of their subjects, as giving them occasion to gratify their malignity in tortures and executions. Every dispensation of Providence, and especially the whole plan of salvation, shows that God delights in the salvation and happiness even of sinners; and that he has done all that was consistent with his own glory, to prevent the necessity, so to speak, of executing vengeance. He could doubtless convert and save all men and all devils: but he hath wise reasons for not doing it. But it must not be inferred, that he will not execute his threatenings on the impenitent: nay, the opposition between the two parts of the verse, strongly implies, that they who do not return from their evil ways, shall certainly perish. Nor can we conceive, for a moment, that the destruction of the wicked will in the least 24 But [s] when the righteous turneth away from his righteousness, and committeth iniquity, [h] and doeth according to all the abominations that the wicked man doeth, shall he live? [i] All his righteousness that he hath done shall not be mentioned: [k] in his trespass that he hath trespassed, and in his sin that he hath sinned, in them shall he die.

25 Yet ye say, [l] The way of the LORD is not equal. Hear now, O house of Israel; [m] Is not my way equal? [n] are not your ways unequal?

26 When [o] a righteous man turneth away from his righteousness, and committeth iniquity, and dieth in them; for his iniquity that he hath done shall he die.

27 Again [p] when the wicked man turneth away from his wickedness that he hath committed, and doeth that which is lawful and right, [q] he shall save his soul alive.

28 Because [r] he considereth, and [s] turneth away from all his transgressions that he hath committed, he shall surely live, he shall not die.

29 Yet saith the house of Israel, [t] The way of the LORD is not equal. O house of Israel, are not my ways equal? are not your ways unequal?

30 Therefore [u] I will judge you, O house of Israel, [x] every one according to his ways, saith the Lord GOD. [y] Repent, and turn * yourselves from all your transgressions; [z] so iniquity shall not be your ruin.

31 [a] Cast away from you all your transgressions whereby ye have transgressed; and [b] make you a new heart and a new spirit: [c] for why will ye die, O house of Israel?

degree interrupt the perfect blessedness of the infinite God; nay, many Scriptures show, that he takes pleasure in the display of his glory by punishing obstinate rebels; though he more delighteth in mercy. Neither must this general declaration be wrested by an application to those "secret "things which belong to God," and not to us. And will not men allow God to delight in mercy unless he show mercy in all possible cases, to the exclusion of his holiness, justice, truth, and wisdom, as the moral Governor of the world? Will they not allow him to be omnipotent, because he hath not created all the worlds which possibly might have been created? May he not be allowed to be good, because he hath not absolutely excluded evil from the creation, which he doubtless could have done? All such objections are the offspring of pride, ignorance, unbelief, and enmity: and whilst vain men would be wise, they are often little aware that they are running into direct blasphemy. In respect both of temporal and eternal retributions, infinite wisdom directs, and seems, (but only seems,) to limit the exercise of divine goodness and mercy. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 24. (Note, iii. 20, 21.) The question here is not, whether truly righteous men ever do thus apostatize. It is certain many who were thought righteous do; and dying without repentance, they must surely perish. This suffices to show the equality of the Lord's dealings with men, which is the subject of the chapter.

V. 25. Unequal, &c. The Jews rebelled against God, robbed him of his glory, and committed manifold abominations; and then they blasphemously charged the Lord with injustice in punishing them for the sins of their fathers. So that their conduct was the very reverse of the justice, truth, goodness, and mercy of the Lord's dealings with them; and they had none to blame for their miseries except themselves.

V. 26, 27. 'It is an opinion, that prevails among the 'Jews even till this day, that at the day of judgment a 'considerable number of good actions shall overbalance 'men's evil ones: so that they thought it a hard case for a 'man, who had been righteous the far greatest part of his 'life, if he did at last commit iniquity, that his former 'righteousness should avail him nothing. In opposition 'to this doctrine, God here declares, that a righteous man 'sinning and not repenting, should die in his sins, and 'that a wicked man, upon his repentance, should save his 'soul alive.' (Lowth.) Notwithstanding this plain declaration, it is obvious, that the notion, current among the Jews, is equally current among the generality of professed Christians; though directly opposite to the whole doctrine of Scripture, and even subversive of it. For, the condemnation of every transgressor by the holy law; salvation by free grace, justification by faith, through the righteousness and atonement of Christ; the necessity of regeneration, the sinfulness of all the supposed good works of the unregenerate and unbelieving; and the great and many defects of the real good works of true believers, with many other doctrines essential to Christianity, must be entirely set aside, before such a scheme of final retribution can be made so much as plausible.

V. 28. We have here, as it were, the beginning and progress of repentance. The man is "come to himself," and he considers, where he is, what he hath done, and against whom he hath offended: he considers the evil, number, and desert of his sins; what cause he hath to be humbled and alarmed; and what need he hath of repentance, conversion, forgiveness, and newness of life. In consequence he turneth from all his transgressions, and obtaineth mercy. Is not this the very same repentance which is delineated in the parable of the Prodigal Son?

* Or, others. 30 God: wherefore turn * yourselves, and live ye.

CHAP. XIX.

A lamentation over the ruin of the royal family of Judah, under the emblem of young lions taken in a net to be destroyed, 1—9: and of a vine and its branches, once flourishing, but now rooted up, withered, or burnt, 10—14.

V. 30—32. The Lord having thus stated the measure of his dealings with every individual, proceeds to assure the Israelites, that he will judge each of them according to his ways: thus it is every where declared, that the Lord will judge every man, at the last day, according to his works. On this he grounds an earnest exhortation to them to repent and turn from all their transgressions; to cast them all away from them; and even "to make them a new "heart and a new spirit." This certainly implies the same thing as regeneration, and a new creation unto holiness: and though man cannot effect this change in himself by any power of his own; yet that temper, to which regeneration restores us, is required of every one by the holy law of God; and the essence of our depravity and apostacy consists in being of the contrary temper. The change is absolutely necessary to the exercise of every Christian grace, and the performance of every Christian duty. It must be effected, or iniquity will be the sinner's ruin: the less a sinner can do of himself, the more need he has to beg of God to work it in him: ordinances and means are appointed, directions and promises are given; in order that they who desire this change, may seek it from God. This is as much man's duty, and as proper a subject for exhortation, as faith, repentance, love to God or man, or any other spiritual service, which the carnal mind can no more perform, than effect this new creation. Indeed exhortations to the same import are found repeatedly in the New Testament. (Marg. Ref.) The Israelites were therefore commanded to do these things, in order that they might be led to feel their own depravity, inability, and misery; and that they might learn to value the promises of God to this effect, and plead them in prayer. (Marg. Ref.) In this sense such exhortations are similar to Christ's command to the paralytic to take up his bed and walk: depending on his help, who gave the command, he attempted obedience, and found himself enabled to perform it. But the sinner's inability is criminal: he might justly be left under condemnation: and when the Gospel commands all men every where to repent; and men so love their sins, and are so proud, that they will not come to him who is exalted to give repentance; they seem resolved to die, as a man, who hath taken poison and refuses the antidote. And it is the height of human presumption and impiety, for men to charge their ruin upon God, when they so criminally despise his law, and neglect the salvation of his Gospel. 'The prophets often exhort the Jews to an inward 'purity;—thereby to take them off from relying on 'an outward legal righteousness. By thus instructing 'them in a more excellent way of serving God, than the 'ceremonial law did directly prescribe; they prepared 'their minds for receiving those truths, which the Gospel 'would more fully discover. God promises, (xxxvi. 26.) 'to "give them a new heart," &c.; 'here he exhorts 'them to make themselves a new heart and a new spirit; 'which difference of expression is thus to be reconciled, 'that although "God works in us to will and to do;" 'and is the first Mover in our regeneration; yet we must 'work together with his grace; at least willingly receive 'it, and not quench or resist its motions.' (Lowth.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—20.

It is not more natural for fallen man to commit wickedness, than it is to excuse or justify it, and to throw the blame on others. Thus men venture to charge God with injustice, rather than condemn themselves; and either deny that future vengeance awaits them, or consider themselves punished, in this and all their sufferings, for the sin of Adam: as if they had not imitated him, and broken the law of God as well as he! An acute wit is very different from heavenly wisdom; and it is often employed as a most dangerous weapon against religion, to the ruin of many, especially of the impious possessor. Detached sentences of Scripture, and instances in providence may be adduced and wrested to support the most detestable doctrine; and even truth itself may be stated in so crude and vague a manner, as apparently to favour the most erroneous inferences. The patience, goodness, and mercy of God to some men, are often perversely interpreted to be injustice to others: as if he might not show mercy to whom he would, and as he would, provided he punish none above their deservings! But the Lord will inquire of men what they mean by their infidel and impious objections and sarcasms; and at length effectually silence them. Then the most admired infidel or profligate will have done with his witty jests and scoffs, and have them turned into wailing and gnashing of teeth: and wo be to them, who thus "laugh now! for they shall "weep and lament." All souls are in the hands of the great Creator and Proprietor of the universe; and he will deal with them either in perfect equity or rich mercy: nor will any perish for the sins of another, who is in no sense worthy of death for his own. Many inquiries may here be started of cases and persons, concerning which Revelation is silent; and therefore we ought to be so, or only to say, "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" In our own case, we know that we have sinned; and our souls must as certainly sink into perdition as our bodies must die, if the Lord should deal with us according to the tenour of his holy law. But, blessed be his name, we are under a dispensation of mercy, and are invited to come to Christ, and to accede to the covenant, of which he is the Surety. Thus sinners become righteous, and being justified by faith, they have peace with God; his "grace teach-"eth them to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live "soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world:" they learn to avoid their easily-besetting, secret, lucrative, or fashionable sins; they "do justice, love mercy, and walk "humbly with God." Thus they evidence that they are justified, and may be assured that eternal life abideth in them; whether they be of Jewish or Gentile extraction; whether their parents were righteous or wicked: for "of "a truth God is no respecter of persons; but in every "nation, he that feareth God and worketh righteousness, "is accepted of him." If this be our conduct and experience, let us give the glory of this salvation to him, and take the comfort of it, in this evil world and in the prospect of death and judgment. Indeed nothing else can give us solid satisfaction: for though there is great encouragement for us to "train up our children in the nurture "and admonition of the Lord;" yet there is no absolute certainty, that they will not take bad courses, and run into and persist in those destructive abominations, that we have most conscientiously shunned and carefully warned them against. In this case they must expect no favour for their parents' sake; but must perish, and their blood will be upon their own heads. But on the other hand, no man need be discouraged as to his own acceptance, on account of the wickedness of his parents and progenitors; (though his constitution, estate, and temporal concerns may be impaired by it:) provided he considers and avoids their crimes, and walks in the ways of repentance, faith, and holy obedience, marked out in the sacred word. But how absurd is their conduct, who are satisfied with any superstition, idolatry, or form, or even without any religion; provided they live as their fathers did, and walk in their ways, true or false, right or wrong! In short "the tree "is known by its fruits: every tree that bringeth not "forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire;" and the more fruitful we are in real good works, the more evidently it appears, that we are "trees of righteousness, "the planting of the LORD, that he may be glorified."

V. 21—32.

How amazing is the condescension of our God in reasoning against the objections of his rebellious creatures! And how inexcusable will they be, who yet say, or think, that his ways are unequal, when it is so plain, that his ways are equal and their ways unequal! This appears with still greater evidence, when we consider that the most wicked man on earth is not excluded from his favour and eternal life, by all his former sins, if he do not impenitently persist in them, or despair of mercy: for if he repent and believe the Gospel, and turn from all his transgressions, and do that which is lawful and right, he shall save his soul alive: none of his sins shall once be mentioned against him to his condemnation; but in his righteousness that he hath done, since his conversion, and by the faith and grace of the Gospel shall he live. As to that righteousness, from which many turn away, to commit all the abominations of the wicked, and to live and die in them; they will by no means be profited by it; but in their trespasses and sins will they perish, and their last state will be worse than their first. But true believers are preserved by God, and persevere in his ways; they keep Christ's commandments and continue in his love: they fear coming short or turning back; and thus they watch and pray, continue to the end, and are saved. And are not these ways of God equal? and what can reasonably be objected to them? As therefore he will shortly judge every man according to his ways; and as he hath no pleasure in the death of a sinner, but rather that he should repent and live: let sinners be warned, and encouraged to repent, turn from and cast away all their transgressions, and seek to the Lord for a new heart and a new spirit. Without this, iniquity must be their ruin; for none will eventually be saved, except those who repent and become new creatures, and walk in newness of life; and none will perish, who thus turn to the Lord. Let them therefore turn these commandments and exhortations into prayers; let them trust in Christ for pardon and strength; and they will by him be enabled to do all things that pertain unto salvation. It is indeed more our interest, as well as more becoming us, to be employed in mourning over and confessing our sins; praying for grace and forgiveness; mortifying our pride and lusts; exercising ourselves unto godliness; and doing good to all men, as we have time and opportunity: than to be disputing about hard questions, perverting the Scriptures, excusing our iniquities, or replying against God.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIX. V. 2–9. The inquiry and answer must not be understood of the mother of Zedekiah, or of the other branches of Josiah's family, but of the Jewish church and nation; which is represented under the image of a lioness, because of the cruelty and oppression which generally prevailed: for the rulers and people of Judah seemed to have lost their humanity, and to have been transformed into savage beasts. The lioness lay down among lions; that is, the Jews formed alliances with the heathens, and learned their manners. Thus she brought up her whelps with lions: that is, the sons of Josiah, though descended from so good a father, yet learned from the people and princes and the surrounding nations, to be ambitious, oppressive, and rapacious, like the tyrants and conquerors of the Gentiles. When Josiah was slain, the people of the land made Jehoahaz king in his stead: and this lion's whelp, being advanced to royal authority, became a young lion, and soon learned to use his power in oppression and cruelty. But Pharaoh-necho and his allies came against him, and took him as a wild beast in a pit; and he was carried thence in chains into Egypt, where he died. And when the people saw there were no hopes of his return, they submitted to Jehoiakim, whom Pharaoh had appointed to be king. Thus he became their young lion; and used his power for eleven years most cruelly; desolating the palaces, cities, and country, by the terror of his oppressions. (Marg. Ref.) At length he drew on him the hatred and vengeance of the king of Babylon, and the neighbouring nations; and he was taken prisoner, and ended his life miserably: so that the terror of his roaring no more disturbed the mountains of Israel. The captivity of Jeconiah, and that of Zedekiah, are not here expressly mentioned: Jeconiah reigned a very short time, and Zedekiah seems rather to have been a timid than a tyrannical prince.

V. 10—13. The Jewish nation, and their princes, are here represented under the emblem of a vine, with many branches. This expression "in thy blood" is obscure, and differently interpreted. Some say, that blood was commonly put at the roots of vines to enrich the soil, and render them more fruitful: or, "in thy quietness;" 'Thy 'mother is like a vine, in the time of her first peaceable 'plantation.' (Bp. Hall.) So long as Judah continued to behave peaceably, the nation flourished: nay, so long as Zedekiah and his subjects quietly submitted to Nebuchadnezzar, they enojyed many blessings, which they forfeited by revolting. (Notes, xix.) This vine was planted by many waters, became fruitful, had many branches, and amongst them strong rods for sceptres; that is, powerful princes had reigned over them, under whom Judah appeared very considerable among the neighbouring kings and nations. But at length the Lord, in anger, had plucked it up, thrown it on the ground, and left it, with all its strong rods, to wither and be burned. That is, the strength and prosperity of the kingdom were decayed and come to nothing. The remnant of this vine was now planted in a barren and dry land: her branches were continually consumed; her princes were slain and carried away captive; and there were none left, except a succession of inexperienced, feeble, and worthless princes, who were speedily about to be entirely deprived of the throne.

V. 14. 'A destruction is risen from among themselves, 'even from the treachery of Zedekiah, which hath utterly 'destroyed the remainder of her hopes; so that now there 'is no more likelihood of any of the royal blood being 'exalted to the government.' (Bp. Hall.) 'This is a 'matter of present lamentation, and shall be so in after 'times.' (Lowth.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

They who associate with ungodly and abandoned persons, will soon be assimilated to them: and when professors of religion form such connexions, their children generally grow up in conformity to the worst maxims and fashions of a wicked world. Having cast off the fear of God, they often seem to be divested even of humanity, and to be transformed into savage beasts: and that most noble and royal blood, of which so many are proud, only distinguishes them, as lions' whelps, from the other beasts of prey. Advancement to authority discovers the ambition and selfishness of men's hearts: and many know no use of power, except as it enables them to catch the prey, and devour their own species. But they who are thus the plague and terror of their neighbours, may expect to be hated and terrified in their turn: they are often hunted and laid wait for like wild beasts; and as they spend their lives in mischief, they gener lly end them by violence. Yet men proceed in the same bloody track, without profiting by the example of their predecessors! It is, and must be for a lamentation, that pious and useful families so soon degenerate, and flourishing churches and nations are so speedily rooted up and withered. But in all these events the Lord is righteous: and his anger dries up and consumes the prosperity of the most flourishing sinners. Yet blessed be God, one Branch of the vine here alluded to, is not only become a strong Rod for the sceptre of them that bear rule, but is himself the true and living Vine: and neither he, nor any of his fruitful branches, shall be rooted up, withered, or consumed for ever. And this is a rejoicing, and shall be for a rejoicing, to all the chosen people of God, throughout all generations.

NOTES.

CHAP. XX. V. 1—3. 'All the prophecies, recorded from the eighth chapter to this, probably belong to the sixth year of Jehoiachin's captivity.' (Lowth. (Notes, viii. 1. xiv. 1—5.) Many conjectures have been formed about these elders and the subject of their inquiry: but it suffices for us to know, that they were addicted to idolatry, and that their inquiry was either a mere pretence, or they vainly attempted to serve God and idols also. Therefore the Lord sware by himself, that he would not be inquired of by them. (Marg. Ref.) 'You shall not receive such an answer as you expect, but such as your hypocrisy deserves.' (Lowth.)

V. 4. Some think, that the prophet attempted to plead with God in behalf of these elders, (according to the marginal translation;) but perhaps he was thus invited and required, to act as their judge, to bring them to a trial, and having proved their guilt, to denounce sentence in the name of God against them. In order to do this, he must set in order before them the abominations of their fathers, of which their own conduct was an exact copy. (Notes, xvi. xxiii. Marg. Ref.)

V. 5, 6. The Lord's choice of Israel, to be his people, was the source of all their privileges: in consequence of this, he made himself known to them by his word and works, when they had generally forgotten him: which he did in order that they might become his worshippers and servants. He lifted up his hand to them, as was customary in solemn oaths, engaging himself to be their God, to effect their deliverance, and to bring them into Canaan; which he had, so to speak, searched out for them, as the most fertile and excellent land on earth; a type of heaven, that chosen inheritance of God's chosen people.

Lifted up, &c. 'I sware that I would be their God, which manner of oath was observed from all antiquity, where they used to lift up their hands towards the heaven, acknowledging God to be the Author of truth, and the Defender thereof, and also the Judge of the heart; wishing that he should take vengeance, if they concealed any thing which they knew to be truth.' (Marg. Ref.)

10 ¶ Wherefore [c] I caused them to go forth out of the land of Egypt, and brought them into the wilderness.

11 And [d] I gave them my statutes, and * shewed them my judgments, [e] which if a man do, he shall even live in them.

12 Moreover also [f] I gave them my sabbaths, [g] to be a sign between me and them, that they might know that [h] I am the LORD that sanctify them.

13 But the house of Israel [i] rebelled against me in the wilderness: they walked not in my statutes, [k] and they despised my judgments, [l] which if a man do, he shall even live in them, [m] and my sabbaths they greatly polluted: then [n] I said, I would pour out my fury upon them in the wilderness, to consume them.

14 But [o] I wrought for my name's sake, that it should not be polluted before the heathen, in whose sight I brought them out.

15 Yet also [p] I lifted up my hand unto them in the wilderness, that I would not bring them into the land which I had given them, [q] flowing with milk and honey, which is the glory of all lands;

V. 7—9. When the Lord had engaged himself to be Israel's God, and to confer every blessing on them; and whilst he was working so many miracles in their behalf: he reasonably commanded them to cast away all their abominable idols, which they looked up to and worshipped; and especially those of the Egyptians their oppressors, who could not defend their devotees against the power of JEHOVAH the God of Israel. But even there, the Israelites rebelled against him, and clave to their idols: insomuch, that he saw reason to say that he would pour out his fury on them in the land of Egypt; that is, he justly might, and certainly would, have destroyed them with the Egyptians, if he had dealt with them according to their deserts. But having called "Israel his son, and his first-born," and having undertaken his deliverance; the Egyptians would have imputed it to his want of power if he had not effected it; they would have concluded, that he was not the only true and living God, and have been hardened in idolatry and blasphemy. Therefore, for the glory of his own name, and to make his perfections known among the Egyptians and the surrounding nations, he spared Israel, and delivered him with his mighty hand and out-stretched arm. The honour of his truth and mercy were also concerned, and required, that he should perform his promises made to their fathers.

V. 11. Gave. 'A favour not afforded to other nations '—such a treasure as David prizes above thousands of 'gold and silver.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

—If a man, &c. (Note, Lev. xviii. 5.) The moral law showed Israel the extent of their duty to God and man; and proved their need of mercy and grace, as well as served for the rule of their conduct; the ceremonial law shadowed forth Christ, their Righteousness and Sanctification. They who properly attended to these judgments and statutes of the Lord, in a humble, believing, and conscientious obedience, would live in them, according to the covenant of grace: and a national observance of these laws and statutes would have ensured Israel's prosperity in Canaan. Yet the manner in which St. Paul quotes this expression, (Rom. x. 5. Gal. iii. 12.) implies, that it was intended to show the Jews, that righteousness could not be obtained by the works of the law: and this well suited the argument in this place; as it served to mark the contrariety between the holy law, the rule of obedience, and Israel's rebellious conduct. So that evidently they had no claim either to temporal advantages or eternal life, by the law to which they trusted; as those blessings could only be claimed by such as had done according to the commandments, and not by those that had violated them all. (Note, Rom. ii. 13. 17—29.) 'If we understand the 'condition in its rigorous sense, as implying an exact and 'unsinning obedience, and as the word life contains the 'promise of eternal life under it; as it was impossible 'to be performed, so no person could lay claim to eternal 'life by virtue of any promise therein contained; from 'whence St. Paul infers the necessity of seeking to Christ 'and laying hold of the promises of the Gospel, for the 'obtaining justification and eternal life.' (Lowth.) The promises in the Old Testament, of pardon, acceptance, and sanctification, and, in a word, of spiritual blessings, belong to the Gospel, as much as those in the New Testament. (2 Cor. i. 20. Heb. vi. 17, 18. viii. 10—12. xi. 13.)

V. 12. The Lord, as a special favour, gave Israel his sabbaths; (which included the holy rest of the weekly sabbaths, and also that of the solemnities and sabbatical years.) These were signs of their special relation to him, as his people: for at those stated times they met him with their worship, and he engaged to meet them with his blessings. They likewise marked and kept up the distinction and separation betwixt them and the Gentiles; and served to bring them more acquainted with God, his perfections, truth, and holy will: so that they were appointed means of sanctification to their souls.

V. 13, 14. (Marg. Ref.) The people in the wilderness were continually rebelling against God: they seemed to think his service a mean and irksome employment. They perferred the worship of the golden calf, and the idols of Egypt and Moab, to his statutes, which were too spiritual to suit their carnal hearts. They also profaned greatly his sabbaths; neglecting the duties of those holy days, and employing them in worldly avocations, or in secret idolatry and wickedness. So that regard to his own glory alone, prevented him from utterly extirpating them in the wilderness.

V. 15. The Lord sware in his wrath, that none of 16 Because [r] they despised my judgments, and walked not in my statutes, but polluted my sabbaths: [s] for their heart went after their idols.

17 Nevertheless [t] mine eye spared them from destroying them, [u] neither did I make an end of them in the wilderness.

18 But [x] I said unto their children in the wilderness, Walk ye not in [y] the statutes of your fathers, neither observe their judgments, nor [z] defile yourselves with their idols:

19 I am [a] the LORD your God; [b] walk in my statutes, and keep my judgments, and do them;

20 And [c] hallow my sabbaths; and they shall be a sign between me and you, that ye may know that I am the LORD your God.

21 Notwithstanding, [d] the children rebelled against me: they walked not in my statutes, neither kept my judgments to do them, which [e] if a man do, he shall even live in them; they polluted my sabbaths: then I said, [f] I would pour out my fury upon them, to [g] accomplish my anger against them in the wilderness.

22 Nevertheless, [h] I withdrew mine hand, and [i] wrought for my name's sake, that it should not be polluted in the sight of the heathen, in whose sight I brought them forth.

23 I [k] lifted up mine hand unto them also in the wilderness, [l] that I would scatter them among the heathen, and disperse them through the countries:

24 Because [m] they had not executed my judgments, but had despised my statutes, and had polluted my sabbaths, and [n] their eyes were after their fathers' idols.

25 Wherefore [o] I gave them also statutes that were not good, and judgments whereby they should not live;

26 And I [p] polluted them in their own gifts, [q] in that they caused to pass through the fire [r] all that openeth the womb, that I might make them desolate, [s] to the end that they might know that I am the LORD.

that generation, that had despised the promised land and attempted to return into Egypt, should enter into his rest: but that they should all wander, and die, in the wilderness, except Caleb and Joshua. (Notes, Num. xiv.)

V. 16. Heart. 'They still had a hankering after the 'idolatries they had learned in Egypt; to which they added new idols, viz. the idols of the Midianites, Amorites,' '&c. (Lowth.)

V. 17. The Lord spared the rising generation, that his promises to their fathers might be fulfilled to them; whilst his wrath was poured out on those that were grown up. His purposes respecting the nation were similar in the time of Ezekiel: he was determined to destroy multitudes by his awful judgments, and to drive them all out of the land of Canaan: but he meant to preserve a remnant, whose children should again inherit the land; and to them he would fulfil his promises, especially that of the Messiah, who would be raised up among them.

V. 18. 'Whereby the Holy Ghost confuteth them 'that say they will follow the religion and example of 'their fathers, and not measure their doings by God's 'word, whether they be approveable thereby or not.' (Marg. Ref.)

V. 21, 22. Even that generation of Israel, which grew up in the wilderness, and lived in the midst of miracles both of judgment and mercy, was frequently rebellious against the Lord, as it appears by the history of their conduct, and by the reproofs given them by Moses. It is, however, evident, that they were much improved by the instructions and judgments of God; and that the generation that entered Canaan, was the best which there ever was of that favoured nation: and indeed the language concerning them, in this passage, is by no means so emphatical as that used concerning their fathers, (13.) Yet God might have justly destroyed them all, (as he did numbers in the matter of Baal-peor:) and he certainly would, had not a regard to his own glory among the surrounding nations, and to the honour of his own truth and grace, influenced him still to spare and bless them.

V. 23. (Notes, Lev. xxvi. Deut. xxviii. xxxii.) The predictions of the dispersion of the Israelites, which were delivered by Moses just before his death, are evidently here referred to. They had a partial accomplishment in the Babylonish captivity; but they are far more exactly fulfilling at this day.

V. 25, 26. 'God in a just judgment for their dis-'obedience to his own laws, gave them up to a reprobate 'mind, and suffered them to walk after the idolatrous and 'impious practices of the heathen. And whereas, by 'obeying his laws, they might have lived happily, they 'became slaves to the vile and cruel practices of the 'heathen idolatries; so as to offer up their very children in 'sacrifice to idols. I suffered them to pollute themselves, 'in those very gifts, which by the law they were to dedi-'cate to my service, (the form Hiphil is elsewhere used in 'the sense of permission.) Their sin brought its own 'punishment along with it, destroying the hopes of fami-'lies and bringing them to utter desolation.' (Lowth.) The first-born were by the law consecrated to God, but they devoted them to Baal or Molech. 'Because they 'would not obey my laws, I gave them up to themselves 'that they should obey their own fancies.' It is astonishing to find, many very learned and able men contend, that the "statutes which were not good," meant the law of Moses, or some part of it; when the prophet evidently spoke of a much later time than the giving of the law;

27 ¶ Therefore, son of man, [t] speak unto the house of Israel, and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord GOD; [u] Yet in this your fathers have blasphemed me, in that they have * committed a trespass against me.

28 For [x] when I had brought them into the land, for [y] the which I lifted up mine hand to give it to them, then [z] they saw every high hill, and all the thick trees, and they offered there their sacrifices, and there they presented the provocation of their offering: there also they made their sweet savour, and poured out there their drink-offerings.

29 Then † I said unto them, What is the high place whereunto ye go? [a] And the name thereof is called Bamah unto this day.

30 ¶ Wherefore say unto the house of Israel, Thus saith the Lord GOD; [b] Are ye polluted after the manner of your fathers? and commit ye whoredom after their abominations?

31 For when [c] ye offer your gifts, when ye make your sons to pass through the fire, ye pollute yourselves with all your idols, even unto this day: [d] and shall I be inquired of by you, O house of Israel? As I live, saith the Lord GOD, I will not be inquired of by you.

32 And [e] that which cometh into your mind shall not be at all, that ye say, [f] We will be as the heathen, as the families of the countries, [g] to serve wood and stone.

33 As I live, saith the Lord GOD, [h] surely with a mighty hand, and with a stretched-out arm, and with fury poured out, will I rule over you:

34 And [i] I will bring you out from the people, and will gather you out of the countries wherein ye are scattered, with a mighty hand, and with a stretch-

when the context clearly explains the meaning; and when "the statutes that were not good," are expressly contrasted with the good laws of God. The giving of the law at mount Sinai could not be intended to punish sins committed by Israel forty years afterwards: and both the moral, the ceremonial, and the judicial law, were good for their several purposes, and salutary to the people for the time being, as far as they used them properly. But God judicially left the people to be blinded by Satan, to prefer the ruinous practices of idolaters to his wise and salutary ordinances: as he is said to "send a strong delusion to believe "a lie, to those who obey not the truth, but obey unrighteousness." Thus he gave them up, for their previous rebellion, to ripen for that destruction which he intended to bring upon them; that they might learn to know God by his judgments, seeing they had despised his mercies. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 27. Yet, &c. Besides all the provocations of Israel in Egypt and the wilderness, the prophet was to charge on them the superstitions, idolatries, and iniquities, that they had committed in the land of Canaan. These had disparaged the perfections of God, and, as it were, blasphemed him; as if he had been less deserving of their worship than the basest idol.

V. 28. As soon as the people were settled in Canaan, where they should have applied themselves to obey the commandments of God, they began to look out for high hills, or shady groves, on which to offer their sacrifices; as more solemn or more retired: and there they presented their oblations, instead of bringing them to the court of the tabernacle; as if they had intended a provocation, rather than an acceptable service. This may be understood either of the high places, where they worshipped God in a prohibited manner, or of those where they were guilty of idolatry.

V. 29. The Lord frequently called the people to an account by his prophets, for these provocations; he inquired of them, What the high place was, to which they went up, that they should so prefer it to his temple? he exposed the very word to odium, that it might sound as offensive in the ears of his worshippers, as a brothel does in those of a virtuous woman: yet so attached were they to these high-places, throughout all their generations; that they still retained the name Bamah, or the high place, as the favourite appellation for the places where they sacrificed. 'What is the high place, or Bamah, which you 'frequent? Who bade you call it so? I named my altar 'Misbeach (the Hebrew word for altar;) but this place 'had its name from the heathen idolatry, and it still re-'tains it.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 30—32. The Jews ought not to conclude, that they were about to suffer only for their fathers' sins; for they were polluted with the same idolatries and iniquities. Nay, the elders, that sat before the prophet, (by whom the Lord would not be inquired of,) were projecting entirely to cast off his worship, and to conform to the idolatries of the people among whom they lived; that they might obtain their favour, share their prosperity, and escape from present affliction and reproach. But the Lord solemnly assured them, that he would not prosper them in this impious attempt: their apostacy would expose them to far severer punishment, than the people would suffer that had been educated in idolatry; they would not be considered as aliens, but as traitors and deserters, who had joined the enemy, and must expect no quarter or favour.—'God tells them, that he will prevent this purpose of 'theirs from taking effect: and we find, that from the 'Babylonish captivity, they have been very cautious of 'committing idolatry, and scrupulous of making the least 'approaches to it.' (Lowth.)

35 And [k] I will bring you into the wilderness of the people, [l] and there will I plead with you face to face.

36 Like [m] as I pleaded with your fathers in the wilderness of the land of Egypt, so will I plead with you, saith the Lord GOD.

37 And I will cause you to [n] pass under the rod, and [o] I will bring you into * the bond of the covenant:

38 And [p] I will purge out from among you the rebels, and them that transgress against me: I will bring them forth out of the country where they sojourn, and [q] they shall not enter into the land of Israel: [r] and ye shall know that I am the LORD.

39 ¶ As for you, O house of Israel, thus saith the Lord GOD; [s] Go ye, serve ye every one his idols, and hereafter also, if ye will not hearken unto me: [t] but pollute ye my holy name no more with your gifts, and with your idols.

40 For [u] in mine holy mountain, in the mountain of the height of Israel, saith the Lord GOD, [x] there shall all the house of Israel, all of them in the land, serve me: there will I accept them, and there will I require your offerings, and the † first-fruits of your oblations, with all your holy things.

41 I will accept you [y] with your ‡ sweet savour, when [z] I bring you out from the people, and gather you out of the countries wherein ye have been scattered; [a] and I will be sanctified in you before the heathen.

42 And [b] ye shall know that I am the LORD, [c] when I shall bring you into the land of Israel, into the country [d] for the which I lifted up mine hand to give it to your fathers.

43 And there [e] shall ye remember your ways, and all your doings, wherein ye have been defiled; [f] and ye shall loathe yourselves in your own sight for all your evils that ye have committed.

44 And ye shall know that I am the LORD, [g] when I have wrought with you for my name's sake, not according to your wicked ways, nor according to your corrupt doings, O ye house of Israel, saith the Lord GOD.

V. 33—38. The Lord further declared, that he would assert his authority over his apostate people, by the powerful and terrible vengeance that he would inflict upon them. He would separate them from the inhabitants of those countries to which they had been driven, with whom they attempted to unite themselves: he would bring them into a situation like that of their fathers in the wilderness. There he would plead his cause with them, and make them to pass under the rod, as the shepherd does the flock, when he distinguishes betwixt the sheep and the goats, or marks out some of them for slaughter: and he would bring them into the bond of the covenant, or deal with them according to it; enforcing the bond, and exacting the penalty, as to the obstinate rebels; and again ratifying it with the penitent and obedient, and showing them mercy according to it. Thus he would destroy from among them the rebels; as he had done from among their fathers, previous to their entrance into Canaan; whom, having brought out of Egypt, he would not suffer to enter into the promised rest. The passage seems to refer to the whole of the Lord's dealings with Israel, from the time when this prophecy was delivered, to the establishment of a small remnant of them in their own land, after the captivity; from among whom the idolaters and idolatry itself were completely destroyed, by their manifold desolations, and the terrible havock made among them. These events are accommodated to the history of Israel's being brought out of Egypt, and purified in the wilderness, before they entered Canaan; though we find not any thing in history, which seems literally to answer to the prediction: but there was a great resemblance in these two distant dispensations. Many, however, suppose, that the dealings of God with the Jews, in after ages, both of judgment and mercy, are foretold.

V. 39. 'An ironical permission, full of indignation 'and rebuke; sharply upbraiding them for despising those 'many warnings which God had given them; and imply-'ing that he was resolved to give them up to strong delu-'sions, as a just judgment for their abuse of the means of 'grace, so long offered to them, and still rejected by them.' (Lowth.) In abhorrence and disdain of their wickedness, he bade them follow their beloved idols, and take the consequence, both at the present and in future. Let them do it at their peril, seeing they would not hearken to him: but let them no more profane and affront his name by joining him with their dunghill gods, and offering sacrifices both to him and them.

V. 40—44. 'In the Christian Church, called God's 'holy mountain, in allusion to the temple at Jerusalem.— 'The prophet expresses the Christian worship by those 'religious observances, which were proper to his own 'time: as the other prophets frequently describe the 'Christian Church, by representations taken from the 'Jewish temple and service.' (Lowth.) God purposed to raise up to himself a large company of spiritual worshippers, when he had destroyed the rebels from among his people. He would restore Israel to their own land, and they would worship him on mount Zion, the eminent and honourable place which he had chosen. There would they find acceptance and oblations; he would be honoured in them among the heathen; and they would know and worship him alone, when he had gathered them from their dispersions into their own land: for they would remember their sins and abhor themselves for them, as true penitents; and they would acknowledge, that he had dealt with them in mercy and for the glory of his name, and not according to their deservings. This was fulfilled in part, by their restoration from captivity; but it seems to be a prediction of the establishment of the Christian Church: and also of the future conversion of the Jews, and their restoration to their own land. (Marg. Ref.)

45 ¶ Moreover the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

V. 45—48. These verses are the beginning of another prophecy, and belong properly to the next chapter. The prophet was ordered to look southward, toward the land of Israel: and though he was about to prophesy against it, his word would drop as the dew or rain: for he would speak with gravity and temper, as one who sought the conversion and not the ruin of the people. (Marg. Ref.) The land of Israel, or the city of Jerusalem had been as a cultivated vineyard; but it was now become a forest, filled with unfruitful trees, abounding with beasts of prey, and about to be cut down and burned. For the Lord was determined to consume the whole forest, both green and dry trees together, that is, persons of all ranks and characters, (xxi. 3, 4.) and all the inhabitants of the land, with all their allies, would be scorched or consumed by it; and thus it would be generally known, that the Lord had kindled the fire, and that it was in vain for man to attempt to quench it.

V. 49. 'They make this an argument for disregarding 'what I say, that I use so many similitudes and metapho-'rical expressions, that they can't discover my meaning, '(xii. 9.) whereupon God commands him in the next chap-'ter to speak the same thing in plain terms.' (Lowth.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

It is incumbent on ministers to charge men's sins upon their consciences, as well as to pray for them, that they may be converted and saved: when this is done in a scriptural manner, they judge and pass sentence on the wicked: and God will ratify their decisions in heaven, and produce them at the last day; except the criminals judge and condemn themselves, and seek his mercy and salvation. It is a dreadful case, when sinners provoke God to swear in his wrath, that he will no more be inquired of by them; and when he gives them up to their lusts and idols; determines to receive no services from them; and says of the barren fig-trees, "Let no fruit grow on you henceforth for ever." Their condemnation then becomes irreversible, and nothing remains for them, but "a certain fearful looking for of "judgment and fiery indignation." In ordinary circumstances, however, none can know this to be their case. Persons of this awful character are always hardened either in presumption or despair; and whilst these alarming subjects should teach us to beware of hypocrisy, no upright inquirer need be discouraged by them; for all, who seek salvation in the Lord's way, shall certainly find it. If he had waited till some of our fallen race had merited his favour, or appeared meet objects of his complacency; nay, till any of us had been disposed to inquire after him and return to him; not one would have been saved. His free love to rebels and enemies moved him to promise and to give the great Redeemer: he mercifully sent his word to us, as he did to Israel in Egypt: he made himself known to us, when we were "enemies in our mind by wicked "works;" and being thus found of us when we sought him not, he taught us to seek his favour, and an interest in his covenanted mercies. Thus he became our God and Portion, and we his worshippers and servants: his word and oath became the security of our souls, and the warrant of our consolations, when we "fled for refuge to lay hold "on this hope set before us:" and we then learned to expect liberty and victory, and an inheritance in that heavenly country, which he hath searched out for his chosen people. But in the day, when the Lord thus makes himself known to sinners, and, "of his great love where-"with he hath loved them even when dead in sins," calls them to life and salvation; he also commands them to cast away all their idols and iniquities, and to defile themselves no more with the abominations of the ungodly world around them; that they may be his people "to show forth "his praise." Yet if we look back to the important season, when we were first awakened to a sense of our guilt and danger; and remember our reluctancy to part with our idolized interests, pleasures, and pursuits; and to bear the requisite cross, reproach, and self-denial: if we consider the opposition, that our hearts made to the humbling doctrines and holy precepts of God's word; or to our procrastination, and the sins which we persisted in committing against the convictions of our consciences and the strivings of the Holy Spirit: we shall be constrained to confess, that the Lord wrought with us, "for his own "name's sake," and "for the glory of his grace;" or he

V. 10—49.

It has been repeatedly observed, that the believer, all his journey through, is conscious of many evils in his temper and conduct; and is continually constrained to confess, that he never could have escaped destruction, if God had not wrought with him for his name's sake, and not according to his own doings. He hath deserved wrath in numberless instances: and he would have turned back and perished a thousand times over, had it been possible, if he had been left to himself. He is therefore more and more disposed to remember his ways and doings, and to loathe and abhor himself, and to give the whole glory of his salvation, from first to last, to the mere mercy and distinguishing grace of God alone. And when he enters heaven, that happy land of promise, (which differs from Canaan, as rebellion, pollution, enemies, and sufferings are for ever excluded;) he is prepared to cast his crown before the throne, and praise redeeming love; and to offer spiritual sacrifices, in that holy mountain, suited to his obligations and his love of his God and Saviour.

In like manner, had not the Lord wrought for his own name's sake, his visible Church must long since have been destroyed: but his honour is concerned in its preservation, lest his name should be profaned amongst idolaters and infidels. The Lord hath given us his oracles and ordinances, his law and his Gospel, for the rule of our conduct and the foundation of our hope: and they are suited, in the proper use of them, to promote our present comfort, and to direct us in the way to everlasting life. He hath also given us his sabbaths, his own day to be kept holy, as a sign of our relation to him, our Creator and Redeemer; and that, in rendering him on it the worship due to his name, we may receive from him the sanctifying grace of his Holy Spirit, to "purify us unto himself a peculiar "people zealous of good works." But wherever we look, we observe multitudes that are called Christians, who do not walk in his statutes, but despise his judgments, and greatly pollute his sabbaths. For their hearts go after their idols: worldly gain, sensual or dissipated pleasure, or other carnal objects, are eagerly pursued even on the Lord's day: and if men serve the devil, the world, and the flesh on this holy day; we cannot suppose, that they serve any better Master on other days.

Alas! it is a very small remnant, even in this highly favoured land, who delight in sanctifying the day of God because they honour and love his ordinances, truths, and precepts: and this remnant are despised as precise and narrow-minded, for obeying the plain word of God, which others generally profess to believe! Thus from time to time, the Church, or different parts of it, become greatly corrupted in every respect: and the Lord gives up vast numbers to follow their own traditions, lusts, and delusions; until their very gifts and services become their greatest abominations. At length he executes his judgments upon them, as he did on Israel in the wilderness; and having by severe discipline destroyed many of the rebels from among them, and reformed the remainder, he commands them not to walk in the statutes of their fathers, but to keep his judgments and do them. Then perhaps for a time spiritual religion revives: but soon the power of godliness begins to decline, dangerous errors, abominable idolatries, or immoralities creep in; and it again becomes necessary by judgments and corrections to plead against them; again to purge out the rebels from among them, and to bring forth a company refined as gold from the furnace: or else to take away their privileges from them, and confer them on some other people.

In these ways, the Lord hath, from the beginning, wrought with his Church for his name's sake; and hath purified her from time to time, instead of utterly destroying her: and his word engages and his honour requires, that he should still have a people on earth; that the gates of hell should never prevail against his Church; and that his cause should finally prevail. But they who remain so insensible and wicked amidst the means of grace, as to cast off his worship, that they may be like the heathen to serve wood and stone, or to live without Christ and without God in the world, may be assured, that they will never prosper in such an impious project. With a mighty hand and an out-stretched arm, the Lord will assert his authority; and if idolatrous Israelites were so severely dealt with, of how much sorer punishment will apostate Christians be thought worthy! The same gracious dispensation, which ensures the salvation of every believer, denounces deeper condemnation on the unbelieving and rebellious: if the rod of the covenant do not bring men to repentance, and to walk with God according to the gracious tenour of it, he will execute upon them the punishment due to the despisers of it: and if any part of his vineyard become a forest of unfruitful trees, he will soon burn it up with unquenchable fire.—Men often deride or revile the truths of God, as if they were obscure and unintelligible: when in fact they understand so much of them, as to hate the light that condemns them. But, whilst others cavil at God's word, or form projects of rebellion: it is our wisdom to humble ourselves before him, and to beg of him to glorify himself in our salvation.

2 Son of man, [a] set thy face toward Jerusalem, [b] and drop thy word toward the holy places, and prophesy [c] against the land of Israel,

3 And say to the land of Israel, Thus saith the LORD; [d] Behold, I am against thee, and [e] will draw forth my sword out of his sheath, and will cut off from thee [f] the righteous and the wicked.

4 Seeing then that I will cut off from thee the righteous and the wicked, therefore shall my sword go forth out of his sheath [g] against all flesh, from the south to the north:

5 That [h] all flesh may know that I the LORD have drawn forth my sword out of his sheath: [i] it shall not return any more.

6 [k] Sigh therefore, thou son of man, [l] with the breaking of thy loins; and with bitterness sigh [m] before their eyes.

7 And it shall be, when they say unto thee, [n] Wherefore sighest thou? that thou shalt answer, [o] For the tidings; because it cometh: [p] and every heart shall melt, and [q] all hands shall be feeble, and every spirit shall [r] faint, and all knees shall be * weak as water: behold, [s] it cometh, and shall be brought to pass, saith the Lord GOD.

8 ¶ Again the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

9 Son of man, prophesy, and say, Thus saith the LORD; Say, [t] A sword, a sword is [u] sharpened, and also furbished:

10 It is sharpened to make a sore slaughter; [x] it is furbished that it may glitter: [y] should we then make mirth? † it contemneth [z] the rod of my son, as every tree.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXI. V. 2—5. These verses evidently explain the parable at the close of the former chapter. Jerusalem and the land of Israel were intended by "the "forest of the south field." The holy places, either means the temple and its courts; or the temple, the holy city, and the holy land. The Lord, who had so long been known by the princes of Judah "as a sure Refuge," was at length turned against them, and was about to draw his sword "to cut off both the righteous and the wicked." As he had determined on this indiscriminate slaughter and devastation, he would commission his sword, (that is, the Chaldean army, the same as the fire in the preceding chapter, that was "to devour both the green and the dry trees,") to go forth against all flesh, throughout the whole extent of the land. Thus the Jews, and indeed all nations, might know, that this destruction was not fortuitous, or the effect of man's policy, ambition, or revenge; but that God had decreed it against a rebellious people, which had filled up the measure of their iniquities. The words, "I will cut "off from thee the righteous and the wicked," cannot mean, that every individual would be slain; but all would be cut off from the land of Israel, though not out of the land of the living; however, they militate very strongly against those who explain the eighteenth chapter, and similar passages, of an exact discrimination observed in these calamities betwixt the righteous and the wicked. Many of the pious Jews were preserved from death during these judgments; but perhaps not all, nor they only: but they were all "cut off from the land of Israel," so that not one remained in it; but all the survivors were either carried captive to Babylon, or migrated into Egypt and other countries. But if any righteous persons fell by the sword, the famine, or the pestilence: as they were removed from the evil to come to a better world, in mercy not in anger, all the promises and emblems, respecting the Lord's special regard to them, might be sufficiently verified. Thus Josiah, though slain in battle, went down to the grave in peace. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6, 7. To give these awful predictions the greater emphasis, the prophet was ordered to sigh deeply and frequently in the presence of the elders, or of the captive Jews; as if his heart would break, or his loins were racked with pain, like the anguish of a woman in travail; (as afterwards he was ordered to cry and howl for the same reason,) (12.) And when the people inquired of him the cause or meaning of his bitter sighs and groans, he was ordered to answer them, that they were extorted by the tidings, which they would soon hear, of the invasion of Judah, and of the siege and destruction of Jerusalem: for these events, which were just at hand, would greatly distress and intimidate the whole company, and deprive them of all courage, strength, and spirits. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9, 10. The sword of war was given into the hands of the Chaldeans by the just indignation of God: and it was sharpened, that it might do the more terrible execution, and furbished, that its very glittering might cause the greater alarm. The Jews it seemed thought that divine vengeance was become as a sword that grows dull and rusts in the scabbard: but they would soon learn, that it was made ready for use, and would be employed against them. Was it then a time for them to rejoice and indulge in sensual mirth? or to deride God's threatenings? and did not their circumstances rather call on them to join with the prophet in sighs and lamentations?

'It contemneth,' &c. 'It makes no distinction between 'the sceptre and common wood; between the branches of 'the royal family, descended from David and Solomon, 'whom I honoured with the title of being my sons; and 'the meanest of the people.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.) Nebuchadnezzar would disregard Israel's relation to JEHOVAH, (Ex. iv. 22.) as well as the sceptre in the hand of 11 And he hath given it to be furbished, that it may be handled: this sword is sharpened, and it is furbished, [a] to give it into the hand of the slayer.

12 Cry and [b] howl, son of man: for it shall be upon my people, it shall be upon all the princes of Israel: * terrors by reason of the sword shall be upon my people: [c] smite therefore upon thy thigh.

13 † Because it is [d] a trial, and what if the sword [e] contemn even the rod? [f] it shall be no more, saith the Lord GOD.

14 Thou therefore, son of man, prophesy, and [g] smite thine ‡ hands together, and [h] let the sword be doubled the third time, the sword of the slain: it is the sword of the great men that are slain, which [i] entereth into their privy chambers.

15 I have set the § point of the sword [k] against all their gates, [l] that their heart may faint, and their ruins be multiplied: ah! it is made bright, it is ‖ wrapped up for the slaughter.

16 [m] Go thee one way or other, [n] either on the right hand, * or on the left, whithersoever thy face is set.

17 I will also [o] smite mine hands together, [p] and I will cause my fury to rest: I the LORD have said it.

18 ¶ The word of the LORD came unto me again, saying,

19 Also, thou son of man, [q] appoint thee two ways, that the sword of the king of Babylon may come: both twain shall come forth out of one land: and choose thou a place, choose it at the head of the way to the city.

20 Appoint a way, that the sword may come to [r] Rabbath of the Ammonites, and to Judah in Jerusalem [s] the defenced.

21 For [t] the king of Babylon stood at the parting of the way, at the † head of the two ways, [u] to use the divination: he made his ‡ arrows bright, he consulted with § images, he looked in the liver.

22 At his right hand was the divination for Jerusalem, to appoint ‖ captains, to open the mouth in the slaughter, [v] to lift up the voice with shouting, [x] to appoint battering rams against the gates, to cast a mount, and to build a fort.

David's descendants; and the sword of God's righteous vengeance would cut down Zedekiah and his family like any other of the trees of the forest. Or, It is the rod of my Son, it despiseth every tree. (Marg.) The rod of the Son of God, by which he destroys his enemies, would pay no regard to any of the trees in that devoted forest. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11, 12. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 6, 7. vi. 11.)

V. 13. These events would be a grievous trial of the faith and patience of God's people; or rather a trial of the Jews and their rulers, whether they would repent or not. And if the sword despised even the rod or sceptre in the hands of Zedekiah, what would be the event? Truly that sceptre would fall from his hands, the temporal kingdom in David's family would cease, and Jerusalem would be desolated. It may be rendered, "What if the sceptre "despise it?" What if Zedekiah despise these warnings and trials, and persist in rebellion? Then he shall be no more, that is, no more king of Judah. 'Ezekiel, moved 'with compassion, thus complaineth, fearing the destruc-'tion of the kingdom, which God had confirmed to David 'and his posterity by promise; which promise God per-'formed, although here it seemed to man's eye, that it 'should utterly perish.' (27.)

V. 14. Be doubled, &c. This is by some interpreted to signify, that the third invasion of Nebuchadnezzar would complete the ruin of Jerusalem. He had taken Jehoiakim captive, and then Jeconiah, and at the third time he would take Zedekiah, and lay the city in ruins and desolate the land. But perhaps it only refers to the repeated prophecies concerning the sword that was coming on the land. (Marg. Ref.) This sword would especially enter into the chambers of the great men, where they concealed their idolatries and iniquities; as they were the ringleaders in rebellion, and would by no means escape.

V. 15. The point of this sword, exciting terror and multiplying destruction, would appear at all the gates of Jerusalem; so that the inhabitants would have no way left to escape.

Wrapped. That it might not lose its edge or polish, till it was to be used: some render the word sharpened. It occurs no were else in Scripture.

V. 16. The sword is here addressed, by a bold figure, as a messenger that was to go and execute his commission on every side.

V. 17. The Lord thus emphatically declared his purpose of encouraging and prospering the besiegers: till he had taken full vengeance on the Jews.

V. 19—22. The prophet was here ordered more plainly to declare, that the sword of the king of Babylon was intended by all these metaphors. He must describe on a tile, a parchment, or the ground, the road from Babylon to a place where it was parted into two roads, one leading to Jerusalem, the other to Rabbath the capital city of the Ammonites. As the people of Judah confided in the fortifications of Jerusalem, and were about to retire within them; so they were called "Judah in Jerusalem "the defenced." This plan would represent the conduct of Nebuchadnezzar. For that prince would march his army from Babylon, intending to destroy both Rabbath and Jerusalem, but undetermined which he should first attack; so that when he came to the parting of the roads, neither 23 And it shall be unto them [y] as a false divination in their sight, * to them that have [z] sworn oaths: [a] but he will [b] call to remembrance the iniquity, that they may be taken.

24 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD: Because ye have made your iniquity to be remembered, in that [c] your transgressions are discovered, so that in all your doings your sins do appear; because I say, that ye are come to remembrance, [d] ye shall be taken with the hand.

25 And thou, [e] profane wicked prince of Israel, [f] whose day is come, when iniquity shall have an end, 26 Thus saith the Lord GOD; [g] Remove the diadem, and take off the crown; this shall not be the same: [h] exalt him that is low, and abase him that is high.

27 † I will overturn, overturn, overturn it; and it shall be no more, [i] until he come whose right it is; and I will give it him.

28 ¶ And thou, son of man, prophesy and say, Thus saith the Lord GOD [k] concerning the Ammonites, and concerning their reproach; even say thou, [l] The sword, the sword is drawn: for the slaughter it is furbished, to consume because of the glittering:

his policy nor his resentment would decide the matter; but he had recourse to divination. This was an appeal to some superior power to determine for him: conducted with many superstitious and idolatrous rites. Three kinds of augury or divination seem to have been used on this occasion. 'They wrote on several arrows the names of the 'cities they intended to assault; and then putting them all 'together promiscuously in a quiver, they drew them out 'thence as lots are drawn; and that city whose name was 'writ on the arrow first drawn, was the city they first 'made war upon.' (Jerom in Lowth.) 'He mingled his 'arrows.' The teraphim, or little images that were carried with them, were consulted as oracles: some artificial answer was supposed to be returned by them: and, having offered sacrifices, the priests or augurs examined the intestines, especially the liver; from the state of which, in different animals, whether mutilated or complete, sound or unsound, or from its colour, they decided, according to the rules laid down among them. The Lord, however, so over-ruled it, that all these inquiries concurred in determining Nebuchadnezzar to march against Jerusalem, rather than Rabbath. And when this was settled, he appointed captains, and prepared every thing for the siege of that city. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 23. The Jews would treat these predictions as false; and disregard all the preparations of the Chaldeans, as if they were no more to be feared than their delusive divinations. They especially, who had sworn allegiance to Nebuchadnezzar, (along with Zedekiah,) and had broken their oaths, and sworn others to the king of Egypt, would be so infatuated as to despise all warnings. Thus they would be delivered into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar, who would remember against them their perfidy and perjury. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 24. Because, &c. The notorious sins of the Jews of that generation, which showed that all their doings were contaminated by impiety and iniquity, had caused the sins of their fathers also to be remembered against them, and rendered it requisite to the glory of God, that they should be delivered into the hands of their enemies. 'Be-'cause your sins cry to heaven for vengeance, ye shall fall 'into the hands and power of the king of Babylon.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 25—27. The Lord, by his prophet, next addressed himself immediately to Zedekiah, as the head of the conspiracy against his authority. He had shown his impiety and iniquity, especially in violating his solemn oath, and revolting from the king of Babylon. But the day was come, when his crimes would meet with condign punishment; and his iniquity and that of his people, would be terminated by their ruin. The Lord had given commandment to divest him of the insignia of royal authority, and to reduce him to the condition of a blind wretched captive: when he would not appear the same person that he had been; or the authority would not be in the same hands. Jeconiah, who was then low in a prison, would again be exalted, and his family would prosper: Zedekiah, who was then on the throne, would be abased: and the Lord would overturn repeatedly the family of David and the government of Judah, till the coming of the Messiah, whose right the kingdom was, and it should be given to him for ever. This may also predict the repeated subversions of the Jewish nation by the Chaldeans, Macedonians, Romans, and many others, to the present day; which will not come to any happy termination, till they submit to their long rejected Messiah: nay, it seems to predict all the convulsions in states and kingdoms, which shall make way for the establishment of his kingdom throughout the earth. 'When the prophets speak to kings in the 'name of God, they lay aside those titles, and expressions 'of respect, which are otherwise due to regal dignity.' (1 Sam. xiii. 13. 1 Kings xviii. 18. 2 Kings iii. 13, 14.) (Lowth.)

Diadem. The Chaldee paraphrase is thus, 'Remove 'the mitre from Seraiah the chief priest, and I will take 'away the crown from Zedekiah the king.'

Overturn. 'After Zedekiah is deprived of regal autho-'rity, there shall be no more kings of that family, till 'Christ come.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 28. The Ammonites, being reprieved by Nebuchadnezzar's decision to besiege Jerusalem, were ready to promise themselves security, and to insult over the Jews. But the prophet was ordered to predict their doom also, which Nebuchadnezzar a few years after executed. "Their "reproach," may either mean the reproach that awaited them, or their reproach of God's people.

29 Whiles [m] they see vanity unto thee, whiles they divine a lie unto thee, [n] to bring thee upon the necks of them that are slain, of the wicked, [o] whose day is come, when their iniquity shall have an end.

V. 29—32. The diviners of the Ammonites encouraged them with vain predictions of victory and triumph, to trample on the Jews when suffering the punishment of their sins. It was not therefore proper, that the sword of vengeance should return into its scabbard, till they too were punished. The Lord would therefore judge and execute vengeance on them in their own land, where the nation first received its existence: (for the Ammonites seem to have increased from a family to a nation, in the same country which they then inhabited.) He would pour his vengeance on them as water: his wrath would burn against them as fire, made more vehement by being blown: he would deliver them into the hands of men, who were cruel and bloody like wild beasts, and used their understandings only for destruction. Thus he would destroy them; they would never recover their former dignity; and in process of time they would be entirely forgotten.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—17.

Dreadful is the case of those against whom God hath set himself as an adversary! yet all impenitent sinners are exposed to this misery. Even holy places and families, that have long been eminent in religion, will have God against them, if they apostatize or greatly degenerate.—In national judgments the sword of God often cuts off both the righteous and the wicked; but not one of the righteous will be involved in the condemnation of the wicked, at the day of judgment and in the eternal world. He often "endures with much long suffering the vessels of wrath, "fitted for destruction:" but when at length he draws his sword it will return no more, till it hath effected all his righteous purposes. But it behooves those who are employed to denounce the awful wrath of God against sinners, to show that they do not desire the woful day: and the example of Christ teaches us, that we ought to weep and lament over those whose ruin we foresee and declare. We should also endeavour to convince them, that we are greatly impressed with the reality, importance, and near approach of those invisible things of which we speak; and instruct them by our example, as well as by our doctrine. It scarcely seems necessary to inquire, wherefore men sigh and mourn in such a world as this: yet they who now mourn with penitent sorrow, and sympathize in the afflictions of God's people, shall rejoice and be exceedingly glad, when all the hearts of ungodly men shall melt, and when they shall in vain call to the rocks to fall upon them and cover them from the wrath of their offended Judge. But when his sharp and glittering sword is drawn against guilty nations or individuals; and when vengeance is at the door, doth it behoove the criminals to make mirth? Would it not be more suitable to them to sigh and mourn, and even to howl and cry? at least to fast and pray, and humble themselves under the mighty hand of God, if so be he will be merciful unto them? In great national calamities his sword often disdains all the petty distinctions on which men pride themselves: the most exalted stations and sacred characters are then blended with the poor and obscure in one common ruin: except that the great are singled out as the principal criminals; and the sword often pursues them into their secret recesses of wickedness, and their most secure hiding-places. Even they who fill thrones, when distinguished by profaneness and iniquity, will be exposed to shame, and their punishments made proportionably conspicuous; if they escape such revolutions, as sometimes hurry monarchs from the throne to the prison: yet death will soon terminate their career, spoil them of their diadems and sceptres, and transmit them as criminals to the judgment-seat of God.

V. 18—32.

The most self-sufficient and ungodly, as well as the most sagacious and politic, sometimes find their counsels so perplexed, as to feel the want of a superior direction: and the vain superstitions and divinations of idolaters proclaim how desirable it is to be directed by the word and Spirit of God. But whatever apparent chance or choice, whatever augury or divination, determine the measures which men adopt; the Lord secretly leads them to execute his wise designs: and even ambitious conquerors, and cruel tyrants, are the undesigning executioners of deserved punishment on condemned criminals. Wherever the sword of divine justice turns, it meets with men deserving of its stroke: but it commonly begins at the sanctuary, and first executes vengeance on those who profane it by their hypocrisy and iniquity. These are the last persons, in general, who give credit to the warnings of God's word: their hearts are often hardened by repeatedly violating the most solemn vows and engagements, and attending on sacred ordinances in an impious and infidel manner; and they are left to themselves, till they ripen for vengeance: then their sins are made to appear, and they are brought to condign punishment. Next to such wicked professors of religion, they will be most severely punished who insult over their falls and miseries. What a frivolous advantage is it to a condemned malefactor to be executed the last of the company! How little reason has he to insult over his fellow-sufferers! yet this is the common conduct of profane men, when they see others punished whilst they are spared; though the sword will not be sheathed till it have consumed them also. But in the midst of the most tremendous predictions and denunciations of wrath, we still hear some report of mercy, and of Him through whom mercy is exercised to sinful men. All these dispensations are in the hand of the only begotten Son of God: and all wars, convulsions, and revolutions, tend to bring forward the establishment of his kingdom. The Lord will overturn, overturn, overturn, till that great revolution takes place, when "the kingdoms of the earth shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ." This should satisfy all who love his rightful authority, and are become his loyal subjects: "what he doeth, they know not now, but they shall know hereafter." But let us be thankful to be employed as instruments of his mercy; let us use our understandings in devising methods of doing good; and let us stand aloof from those brutish men, who are only skilful to destroy.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXII. V. 2. Jerusalem, instead of a holy city, was become "a city of bloods," filled with murder and every crime for which men were punishable by death. The prophet therefore, instead of pleading in her behalf, was summoned to sit in judgment on her: whilst the Lord himself assumed the office of an accuser and a witness, and showed that she merited the sentence of condemnation denounced against her. (Mal. iii. 5.)

V. 3—5. There is a peculiar emphasis in all these accusations brought against Jerusalem, arising from the consideration, that this was the city which God had chosen for the place of his temple, and favoured with his oracles, ordinances, special presence, and protection, above all the cities upon earth. Yet the inhabitants of this very city were peculiarly guilty of murder and idolatry, the two most atrocious of all crimes. They shed much blood in sacrificing their children to idols, persecuting God's prophets and servants, and in cruelly oppressing the poor, and by iniquitous laws and unrighteous decrees; and probably by frequent assassinations, in perpetrating robberies, and in furious quarrels. So that the people seemed in haste to bring forward the time of vengeance. They also made idols to defile themselves: which was eventually to destroy themselves, as it was sure to provoke the Lord to destroy them. Thus they would speedily arrive at those years of desolation, that had been predicted; when they would become the objects of scorn and reproach to the heathen: for even the idolaters, whose gods they worshipped, having tenaciously adhered to the religion of their fathers, would mock them for forsaking JEHOVAH, and insult them under the miseries that their rebellion had exposed them to; so that their infamy would equal their misery. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6—11. (Marg. Ref.)

12 In thee have they [x] taken gifts to shed blood; [y] thou hast taken usury and increase, and thou hast [z] greedily gained of thy neighbours by extortion, [a] and hast forgotten me, saith the Lord GOD.

14 Can [e] thine heart endure, or can thine hands be strong, in the days that I shall deal with thee? [f] I the LORD have spoken it, and will do it.

V. 12. 'The judges have taken bribes, not only to 'pervert justice, but even to take away the lives of the 'innocent.' (Lowth.)—All the immorality, as well as idolatry, of the Jews, arose from the forgetfulness of God, of his perfections, commandments, testimonies, promises, and wonderful works; and of their relations and obligations to him. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 13. The Lord was about to show his abhorrence of the iniquity committed by his professed worshippers, and his earnestness in punishing it; as men smite their hands together, when they are provoked beyond what they are able to bear. The old translation has covetousness, instead of dishonest gain. There is nothing for dishonest in the original; and the insertion of this epithet may lead some to think, that no eagerness after gain is hateful to God, unless attended by injustice: whereas "covetousness," in all cases "is idolatry."

V. 14. (Marg. Ref.) The utter inability of sinners to stand against that God, whom they continually set at defiance, shows their folly to be equal to their impiety.

V. 15. When Jerusalem was desolated and laid in ruins, her iniquity and idolatry were entirely purged out, as by fire: and idolatry was never after practised there, till the final destruction of the city by the Romans.

V. 16. In thyself. Or, For thyself. The Lord had been the Portion of his people: and he had allotted Canaan to them for their temporal inheritance. But they had forfeited his favour, and were driven out of the country; they might therefore provide for themselves, and get what inheritance they could among the nations, by whom they were enslaved and carried captive: and thus they should know the Lord, by experiencing the misery of forfeiting his favour and incurring his indignation. (Marg. Ref.)

Thou shalt be profaned, &c. (Marg.) 'Thou shalt no 'longer enjoy the privileges of a city called by my name; 'but shalt be profaned by infidels.' (Lowth.)

V. 18—22. Israel, compared with other nations, had been as the gold and silver compared with the baser metals. But they were now become as the dross or scum of silver, the refuse that is consumed in the furnace, or thrown away, when the silver is refined. Or they were become as brass, tin, iron, and lead, or a mixture of such metals as are comparatively of small value. These may mean different characters among them, all far beneath what Israelites ought to have been, and at best only equal to the heathen. The Lord intended therefore to gather them into Jerusalem, as metals are cast into the furnace; to make the fire exceedingly hot under them by blowing it: and to leave them there to be melted and proved; that if there were any gold or silver, it might be separated and refined, and that the dross and base metal might be consumed. The wrath of God kindled and blew this fire, which consisted of the judgments inflicted on the Jews by the Chaldeans; by whom Jerusalem was entirely destroyed, and all orders and characters of men were either slain or reduced to a wretched captivity.—The destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, and the long continued calamities of the Jews since that event, seem also to have been intended by the Spirit of prophecy, though the Chaldean invasion was primarily foretold.

V. 24. No cleansing, purifying, fertilizing showers of rain, attended on these tremendous storms: the land still continued polluted with idolatry and wickedness, after all the calamities which had been experienced, and notwithstanding the predictions of more entire desolations. The people were not led to repentance or reformation, but grew more and more wicked amidst them all.

V. 25. The false prophets, who were numerous, conspired together to maintain the authority of their lying predictions, to encourage the people in wickedness, and to run down the few who spake the word of God. Perhaps they boasted of their unanimity, as a proof of the truth of their predictions: whereas it was a wicked conspiracy against the cause of God and the interests of true religion. They resembled "roaring lions ravening the prey;" they were fierce, cruel, and rapacious, seeking only to enrich themselves, and be avenged on all who opposed them. They not only deceived the souls of men by false doctrine: but they procured the death of numbers, that they might take the treasure and precious things belonging to them: thus they multiplied the widows in Jerusalem, by the murder of their husbands on one pretence or other; and reduced them to beggary, by seizing their property as forfeited.

V. 26. The whole company of the priests were become like Hophni and Phinehas: they wrested the law of God from its true meaning, that it might seem to sanction their enormities: or they contemptuously broke it for their own ungodly gain! They profaned the temple by their crimes; where the sacrifices and oblations were offered, or used by them, in a most unholy manner. They disregarded the distinction betwixt holy and profane, and betwixt clean and unclean, both in respect of times, meats, persons, and actions; making every thing bend to their interest. They connived at, and joined in, the profanation of the sabbaths; and their sacred function was so disgraced by their crimes, that the name of God was greatly profaned by them.

V. 27, 28. The prophets employed all their ingenuity to varnish over the crimes of the princes, who were like ravening wolves, and took bribes to shed innocent blood. By these means the prophets shared the dishonest gain with the princes, or availed themselves of their authority to gratify their avarice or revenge. And thus from them robbery and oppression were diffused through the land.

V. 30. I sought, &c. Jeremiah, and some few others, endeavoured to bring the people to repentance, and to avert divine judgments by their prayers: but they were greatly despised; their efforts were generally and pertinaciously opposed, and almost entirely unsuccessful; and their prayers were discouraged. There was not one, however, that possessed authority or influence, who made a good use of it. Neither the king nor any of his nobles; neither the high priest nor any of the chief priests; not one of the scribes, the members of the sanhedrim, or the magistrates; nor of those who possessed credit and influence. None of them all employed their abilities and authority to stop the progress of wickedness, and to bring the principal offenders to justice; or endeavoured by their labours and example to promote a reformation; or to interpose by their prayers to avert divine judgment. The Lord, (speaking after the manner of men,) sought for some Moses, Phinehas, or Samuel, to stand in the gap on this occasion: but as he found none, the destruction of Jerusalem was inevitable.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—16.

How strong must the stream of human depravity be, when it can burst through so many powerful obstructions, and inundate even the city of God with such a torrent of horrible wickedness! We must not excuse nor scruple to expose the crimes of men, because they live in holy places, or occupy sacred functions: for when professing Christians,

THE word of the LORD came again unto me, saying,

2 Son of man, there were [a] two women, the daughters of one mother:

3 And they committed [d] whoredoms in Egypt; they committed whoredoms, [c] in their youth: there were their breasts pressed, and there they bruised the teats of their virginity.

or the clergy, become odious by their vices; the glory of God requires, that they should be made a reproach and a mocking even to the heathen: and if they be sheltered from deserved punishment and contempt, religion itself will be disgraced, or the sacred ministry despised; but their infamy and vexation show, that God will not connive at wickedness in persons of any name or station. It is happy for mankind, that the power of ungodly men is limited: for they who perpetrate the most injustice and murder, would do still more were it in their power. But whilst they greatly harass and afflict others, they destroy themselves. The Lord notes the sins of men with all their aggravations: and as he will call them to account for their idolatries, murders, and outrageous cruelties; so he will not overlook the neglect and contempt shown by children to their parents; the oppression of those of other religions, nations, or complexions; the vexation of orphans and widows; the slanders by which characters and often lives are destroyed; the profanation of his holy sabbaths, the neglect of his ordinances, or hypocrisy in attending on them; the preference given by men to their own traditions and superstitions, above his truths and precepts; their multiplied violations of his holy law, in the gratification of their sensual appetites, and in every species of lewdness; or their bribery, extortion, and greediness of gain, however acquired. It is very common for sinners secretly to indulge their worldly lusts; and to varnish it over with a zealous profession of religion, and a great attachment to some of its doctrines or observances: and thus they impose on themselves or on others; and perhaps exclaim against those who warn them of their danger, as precise, or over rigorous. But can "their "hearts endure, or their hands be strong, in the day "that God shall deal with them," as he has spoken? If in temporal judgments, every heart melts and all hands wax feeble; what will be the case "in the day "of wrath, and revelation of the righteous judgment of "God?" Will the stout-hearted, at that awful season be able to harden their hearts under misery, as they now do in impiety? Will they despise the accomplishment, as they now do the revelation of the wrath of the almighty God? As this must be impossible; let them, ere it be too late, submit to God and seek his mercy and salvation. And let those who find acute pain, or lingering disease (comparatively light and momentary afflictions,) very hard to be endured, take warning to "flee from the "wrath to come," lest a far "worse thing come upon "them."

Whenever rulers and princes choose to be like ravening wolves, and to shed blood in oppression or persecution; they will be sure to find profane priests and false prophets, to buoy up their confidence and keep them in countenance! There always were men of this stamp, who would violate God's law, contradict his truths, explain away his precepts, prostitute his ordinances, see vanity, divine lies, confound all distinctions betwixt holy and unholy, daub the wall with untempered mortar; and even become caterers to the lusts, or instruments of the cruelty and iniquity of wicked rulers, for a share of the spoil, and that they might be permitted to take the treasure and the precious things. Thus they destroy both the lives and souls of men for filthy lucre's sake. By such professed ministers of religion, whose false doctrines are devised to hide the shame of their wicked lives, the Church of God becomes a den of thieves instead of a house of prayer; the gold and silver become dross and base metal; and nations are prepared to be melted or consumed by the fire of the divine indignation. And if lighter visitations be not sanctified, and rendered effectual to bring men to repentance and fruits meet for repentance; they will prove to be the forerunners of desolating judgments and irreversible destruction. But let every one, according to his measure of ability and influence, endeavour to make up the hedge and to stand in the gap, to stop the progress of iniquity, and to avert the judgments of God from our guilty land. The Lord seeks for such men, and will accept their prayers and efforts: and so long as any are found, especially among our princes, senators, magistrates, and rulers in Church or state, we may hope to be still preserved: but when none shall remain of this character, it may be expected that God will pour out his indignation upon us, and recompense our ways upon our heads, as he hath spoken. Let then, all, who fear his name, unite to promote his truth and righteousness: even as zealously as wicked men of every rank and profession often conspire to run them down.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIII. V. 2. The two nations, of Israel and Judah, were both descended from one common stock, and at first formed but one people or family.

V. 3. As soon as the family of Jacob was grown up into a people, they were seduced into idolatry, and initiated into those abominations to which they ever after were so exceedingly prone.

lah [d] the elder, and Aholibah her sister; and [e] they were mine, and they bare sons and daughters. Thus were their names: Samaria is * Aholah, and Jerusalem † Aholibah.

5 And [f] Aholah played the harlot when she was mine; and she [g] doted on her lovers, [h] on the Assyrians her neighbours,

6 Which were clothed with blue, captains and rulers, [i] all of them desirable young men, horsemen riding upon horses.

7 Thus she ‡ committed her whoredoms with them, with all them that were ◊ the chosen men of Assyria, and with all on whom she doted: [k] with all their idols she defiled herself.

8 Neither left she her [l] whoredoms brought from Egypt: for in her youth they lay with her, and they bruised the breasts of her virginity, and poured their whoredom upon her

9 Wherefore [m] I have delivered her into the hand of her lovers, into the hand of the Assyrians, upon whom she doted.

10 These [n] discovered her nakedness: [o] they took her sons and her daughters, and slew her with the sword: and she became ‖famous among women: for they had executed judgment upon her.

11 And when [p] her sister Aholibah saw this, she * was more corrupt in her inordinate love than she, and in her whoredoms more than † her sister in her whoredoms.

12 She doted [q] upon the Assyrians her neighbours, [r] captains and rulers clothed most gorgeously, horsemen riding upon horses, all of them desirable young men.

13 Then I saw that she was defiled, [s] that they took both one way;

14 And that she increased her whoredoms: for when she saw men [t] pourtrayed upon the wall, the images of the Chaldeans pourtrayed with [u] vermilion,

15 Girded [x] with girdles upon their loins, exceeding in dyed attire upon their heads, [y] all of them princes to look to, after the manner of the Babylonians of Chaldea, the land of their nativity:

16 And ‡ as soon as she saw them with her eyes, she doted upon them, [z] and sent messengers unto them into Chaldea.

17 And the ◊ Babylonians came to her into the bed of love, and they defiled her with their whoredom, and she was polluted with them, [a] and her mind was ‖ alienated from them.

18 So she [b] discovered her whoredoms, and discovered her nakedness: then [c] my mind was alienated from her, like as my mind was alienated from her sister.

19 Yet she [d] multiplied her whoredoms, [e] in calling to remembrance the

V. 4. The kingdom of Israel, of which Samaria was the capital city, containing ten tribes, and occupying the larger part of Canaan, was called the Elder Sister in this parable. "Aholah," the name given to her, signifies, Her tent, or tabernacle; and implies, that the whole of the religion established in Israel was a human invention, a temple and service of their own, and not of God's appointment. "Aholibah," the name given to the younger sister, or to the kingdom of Judah and the city of Jerusalem, signifies, "My tent in her;" and implies that the worship established in Judah, was from God, and that his temple was indeed at Jerusalem: for the profanation of it was the grand aggravation of the sins of the Jews. Both these sisters belonged to the Lord: they were solemnly espoused to him at Mount Sinai, and bare sons and daughters to him; that is, children of God, true believers were raised up among them: and had they continued faithful to him, the whoredoms of their youth in Egypt would not have been mentioned against them.

V. 5—10. The kingdom of Israel not only revolted from the family of David, but apostatized from God, whose people they were by the most solemn engagements. In addition to their former gross idolatries, in worshipping the golden calves and Baal; in the latter times of their nation they connected themselves with the Assyrians, who became their neighbours by conquering the Syrians. They then became dotingly fond of their idols: being captivated by the comely persons and splendid appearance of the Assyrian captains and horsemen; and thinking every thing desirable, which tended to connect them with these new idolatrous allies. Thus they defiled themselves with their idols: and at the same time they retained the idolatries which they had first learned in Egypt. Wherefore the Lord at length punished them by the kings of Assyria, who turned against them, entirely spoiled their country, and slaughtered, enslaved, impoverished, and dispersed the inhabitants. Thus they executed judgment upon Samaria and Israel, and Aholah became famous or a name for her crimes and her calamities. The expression means celebrated, whether in an honourable or a dishonourable manner; either famous or infamous. 'She had been formerly 'renowned among the heathen for her beauty; (xvi. 14.) 'so now she was every where talked of as a remarkable 'instance of God's vengeance, and set forth as an example 'to other cities and nations, to deter them from the like 'abominations.' V. 11—21. All the time that the kingdom of Israel was ripening for judgments, and even after it was ruined, Judah was growing more and more corrupt, and devoted to idols: and in the reign of Ahaz, afterwards in that of Manasseh and Amon, and at last after the death of Josiah, the Jews were more mad upon their idols than the Israelites had been; so that the efforts of their pious princes to reform them only tended to show the inveteracy of the disease, which increased amidst the most powerful remedies used to abate it. They too connected themselves with the Assyrians, and were enamoured of them and their idols; and then with the Chaldeans, and followed their idols: still retaining also their attachment to the Egyptians and their idols. Thus they were like those abandoned women, who have cast off all regard to decency, duty, or consequences; and are given up in the most infatuated manner to their unbridled inordinate passions, and are ready to prostitute themselves to every man they see: and their conduct was represented by these allusions, to show how loathsome and hateful idolatry is in the sight of God. But after a short time they were as much alienated from the Chaldeans, as they had been attached to them; (as is frequently the case between bad women and their paramours:) and this made way for their tempters to become their executioners. For though they were alienated from the Chaldeans, they continued to provoke the Lord by their vile idolatries and heathen alliances, especially with the Egyptians: so that he was at length entirely alienated from them. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 24. I will set, &c. The Lord employed the Chaldeans to execute his judgments on the Jews: and they intended to judge and condemn them, for violating the solemn treaties and rebelling against them. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 25. Nose, &c. This refers to the severe vengeance, which enraged jealous husbands sometimes took on their adulterous wives; or to the ignominious and terrible punishment that was publicly inflicted on them: and it implied that God would employ the Chaldeans to destroy the king, princes, priests, and prophets of Judah; and, as it were, first to mutilate, and then put to death, this infamous adulteress with her whole family.

V. 27. 'These severe judgments shall effectually deter 'thee from idolatry, and make thee abhor the least ap-'proaches to it.' (Lowth.) This prediction is frequently repeated; and the accomplishment of it has been most wonderful. It might have been expected, that a nation, ever prone to idolatry whilst in a country where the worship of the true God was established and none else tolerated, would have readily conformed to the idolatrous usages of the nations, among whom they were scattered by the captivity, and so have been incorporated with them. Yet neither the authority, the frowns, the examples, nor the favour of their conquerors or powerful neighbours; nor their own fears, hopes, interests, or predilection for the sensual jovial worship of idols, could prevail with them to run into gross idolatry, during the captivity, or afterwards! Nay, they were instrumental to the proselyting of numbers of idolaters to the worship of JEHOVAH, in the countries where they were dispersed! And though, since their national rejection of Christ, the Jews have been as destitute even of the appearance of true religion, as can well be conceived; yet they have in general been preserved from gross idolatry, during almost eighteen hundred years! The fact itself is unparalleled in the history of mankind; but it must increase the astonishment of every reflecting person, who carefully compares it with these express predictions. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 28. 'The Chaldeans were thy lovers formerly;

29 And they shall [a] deal with thee hatefully, and shall take away all thy labour, and shall leave thee naked and bare, and [b] the nakedness of thy whoredoms shall be discovered, both thy lewdness and thy whoredoms.

30 I will do these things unto thee, because [c] thou hast gone a whoring after the heathen, and [d] because thou art polluted with their idols;

31 Thou hast [e] walked in the way of thy sister; therefore will I give [f] her cup into thine hand.

32 Thus saith the Lord GOD; Thou shalt [g] drink of thy sister's cup deep and large: [h] thou shalt be laughed to scorn and had in derision; it containeth much.

33 Thou shalt be [i] filled with drunkenness and sorrow, [k] with the cup of astonishment and desolation, with the cup of thy sister Samaria.

34 Thou shalt even [l] drink it and suck it out, and thou shalt break the sherds thereof, [m] and pluck off thine own breasts: for I have spoken it, saith the Lord GOD.

35 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD; [n] Because thou hast forgotten me, [o] and cast me behind thy back, [p] therefore bear thou also thy lewdness and thy whoredoms.

36 ¶ The LORD said moreover unto me: Son of man, [q] wilt thou * judge [r] Aholah and Aholibah? yea, [s] declare unto them their abominations;

37 That [t] they have committed adultery, [u] and blood is in their hands, and with their idols have they committed adultery: and [x] have also caused their sons, whom they bare unto me, to pass for them through the fire, to devour them.

38 Moreover this they have done unto me: [y] they have defiled my sanctuary in the same day, [z] and have profaned my sabbaths:

39 For when they had slain their children to their idols, then [a] they came the same day into my sanctuary to profane it; and, lo, [b] thus have they done in the midst of mine house.

40 And furthermore, that [c] ye have sent for men † to come from far, unto whom a messenger was sent; and, lo, they came: for whom [d] thou didst wash thyself, [e] paintedst thy eyes, [f] and deckedst thyself with ornaments,

41 And sattest upon a ‡ stately bed, and [g] a table prepared before it, [h] whereupon thou hast set mine incense and mine oil.

42 And [i] a voice of a multitude being at ease was with her; and with the men of the ‖ common sort [k] were brought ‖ Sabeans from the wilderness, which put [l] bracelets upon their hands, and beautiful crowns upon their heads.

43 Then said I unto her that was [m] old in adulteries, Will they now commit * whoredoms with her, and she with them?

44 Yet they went in unto her, as they go in unto a woman that playeth the harlot; [n] so went they in unto Aholah and unto Aholibah, the lewd women.

V. 40—42. The Jewish princes and nobles used every artifice to induce the heathen nations to enter into alliances with them; and bestowed pains to gain admission with them to their idolatrous worship, as harlots do to inveigle their lovers. And when their ambassadors came before them, besides other methods of making themselves appear alluring or considerable, they took care to be surrounded with luxurious and effeminate retainers; who welcomed the ambassadors of the idolatrous princes with loud acclamations. 'They sent into other countries, to have such 'as should teach the service of their idols.' The table, refers to the idolatrous sacrifices, and the feasts connected with them. The word rendered Sabeans, may mean drunkards, (Marg.) and it is very probable, that the drunken and mad revels, which the worshippers of Bacchus made in honour of that filthy idol adorned with chaplets and other decorations, and accompanied with music, songs, and dances of the most sensual kind, may here be referred to.

45 And the [o] righteous men, they shall judge them [p] after the manner of adulteresses, and after the manner of women that shed blood: [q] because they are adulteresses, and blood is in their hands.

46 For thus saith the Lord GOD; [r] I will bring up a company upon them, and will give them * to be removed and spoiled.

47 And [s] the company shall stone them with stones, and † dispatch them with their swords; they [t] shall slay their sons and their daughters, [u] and burn up their houses with fire.

48 Thus will [x] I cause lewdness to cease out of the land, [y] that all women may be taught not to do after your lewdness.

49 And [z] they shall recompense your lewdness upon you, and [a] ye shall bear the sins of your idols: [b] and ye shall know that I am the Lord GOD.

CHAP. XXIV.

The prophet is informed of the day when Nebuchadnezzar laid siege to Jerusalem, 1, 2. He is shown the miseries of the Jews and the destruction of the city, by the parable of a boiling pot, 3—14. He is forbidden to mourn for the sudden death of his wife; to denote, that the calamities of the people should ex-

V. 43, 44. The Lord repeatedly warned the Jews not to enter into alliances with idolaters, nor to join their idolatries: but though they were grown hoary in these practices, and had suffered so much by them, that it might have been hoped they would have been weary of them; yet they were as eager after them as ever!

V. 45. Righteous, &c. As upright magistrates used to condemn and execute judgment on adulteresses and murderers; so did the prophets in the name of God denounce sentence against Jerusalem and Samaria: and even the heathen princes, who executed the sentence, were more righteous than the apostate sufferers. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 49. Bear, &c. 'Ye shall bear the punishment 'due to your idolatry. To bear sin or iniquity, is a noted 'expression in Scripture, signifying the undergoing of the 'punishment due to it.' (Lowth.) This observation is of great importance, in respect of our Lord's sufferings, and the sense in which he "bare our sins in his own body on * the tree."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

They who first draw others into wickedness will have a dreadful account to render: for when the fences of modesty, fear, and conscience are broken down, and habits of sinful indulgence are contracted, it is very difficult to reclaim the offenders. Bad customs and connexions so pollute the memory, the imagination, and the affections, and so weaken the authority of reason and conscience over the inferior inclinations; that, even after apparent reformation, the offenders are very prone to relapse into their former practices. Every object tends to bring them to remembrance, associated with the idea of pleasure, and separated from the recollection of the painful consequences: and thus they are again tempted to return to them. When sinful imaginations are indulged, and former scenes of vice reviewed with delight, there can be no true repentance or change of heart: for, true penitents reflect with loathing and remorse on the iniquities of their former years. Whilst our ears and minds are wounded with the mention of the practices of those who work all uncleanness with greediness; we are not generally aware, that these abominations have in them less turpitude, than our ingratitude to, and enmity against God, except as they partake of that criminality in common with more decent transgressions. If we would not be polluted with wickedness, we must avert our eyes from it, and close our senses against those objects which excite sinful thoughts and inclinations. So long as men are attracted with personal accomplishments and external embellishments, and with the pomp and pride of life, they will always be tempted to prefer worldly connexions, fashions, and maxims, to the worship and service of God, and the company of his people: and an intercourse with polished but irreligious nations always occasions an increase of vanity and iniquity. That love which is cemented by concurrence in sin, generally terminates in disgust, contempt, and enmity: and God commonly employs tempters to punish those who listen to them. When sinners will not take warning by the punishment of others, they will be made warnings themselves, to teach men not to copy their crimes. Contempt, astonishment, desolation, rage, and despair, will be the portion of the cup of all who forget God, turn their backs on him, and refuse to return: but they who are his people by profession, and by sacramental vows and engagements, and yet apostatize, will be punished most severely; and especially such as, after having done those abominable things which God hateth, venture to go into his sanctuary and profane his ordinances, to compromise for or cloak their crimes. If the grace of God do not change men's hearts, old age will not cure them of the love of sin: nay, the filthiness of the heart often seems to increase with the decays of nature; and worn out debauchees, like rotten wood, become more inflammable when ready to moulder into dust! How dreadful must it be for men to enter the eternal world in such a temper of soul, and with such vile affections! Unrepented, unmortified, unpardoned sin, must end in the destruction of body and soul, in time and to eternity: families, churches, and nations are ruined by it continually; and all righteous men and holy angels, yea, the whole assembled world, will applaud the sentence, which at the last day the Judge shall pronounce against the workers of iniquity.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIV. V. 1, 2. The prophet resided many hundred miles from Jerusalem; yet on the very day when the siege of that city was formed, the Lord revealed it to him; and ordered him to make such a memorial of it, as would afterwards give authority to his word, that it was in truth the word of God. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3—5. To represent to the rebellious Jews the certain event of the siege, the prophet was ordered to speak a parable to them. For the Lord gave repeated orders, (as in haste to be obeyed,) to set on a pot and pour water into it. Into this they were directed to gather the pieces of an animal, or of several animals, the choice of the flock; especially the choice pieces and bones. This represented Jerusalem besieged by the Chaldeans: all ranks of men were gathered into it, by taking refuge within the walls, especially the nobles and princes; and thus they were retained in the city to their destruction. 'Add this pa-'rable; though they seem resolved not to take heed to 'what thou deliverest, either in plain words, or in figurative expressions. Burn also the bones, &c. The bones of those who had been unjustly slain in the midst of the city, (xi. 6, 7.) whose blood cries for vengeance 'against it, and kindles God's anger like fire.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6—8. Jerusalem, that bloody city, (Marg. Ref.) was the pot, and the wickedness committed in it the scum. The judgments of God upon the Jews caused this scum to arise, by exciting convictions, and discovering their crimes. Under these dispensations they should have put away their transgressions; as the scum, which arises by the heat of the fire, is taken off from the top of the pot. But they grew worse and worse; their sins remained unrepented and unpardoned, and therefore their miseries would continue and increase. All the besieged would endure lingering and dire calamities, till it came to the turn of each to perish, or to fall into the hands of the besiegers: multitudes would die during the siege, by the sword, by famine, and pestilence; no lot would fall upon them, which should be slain, and which spared, (Marg. Ref.) but they would be involved in one common ruin; and all, who survived the siege, would either be slain, or enslaved by the conquerors, or driven as wretched exiles to wander and perish in other countries. For, the guilt of Jerusalem's murders and other iniquities, remained in the midst of her. Indeed the murderers had avowed their crimes: the blood shed by them was, as it were, set on the top of a rock, a conspicuous place, into which it would not sink, and where it could not be concealed; and they disdained even to cover it with dust, or to bestow the least pains to hide it. 'The words 'allude to the command of the law, that they should cover 'the blood of any beast with dust: which was not only 'intended to prevent their eating of blood, but also to give 'men a sort of horror at the sight of blood.' (Lowth.) (Note, Lev. xvii. 10—16.) The Lord would therefore call up his hot displeasure, expose their wickedness to all the world, and make their punishment as notorious as their crimes had been.

V. 9—11. The great pile for fire represented the power, courage, violence, and indignation of the Chaldeans, which would exceedingly distress the Jews, and both prevent their escape and accelerate their ruin. The command to heap on wood, &c. denoted the commission given the besiegers to conduct the assault with increasing vigour, and to treat the Jews with marked severity: so that they would be wasted in the city like flesh in the boiling pot; and all their previous calamities would prepare them for a prey to the Chaldeans, as the meat is stewed, and seasoned for relishing food. For they would in this manner glut their revenge, cruelty, and avarice, as if enjoying the pleasures of a feast; and they would pursue the poor remains of the people with unrelenting rage, as men burn the bones, when they have eaten the flesh from off them. But as the pot was still polluted with the scum, or rust of the metal, (with the relics of their idolatry and iniquity,) it must also be heated, burned, and even melted by the fire, till wholly purified: that is, Jerusalem would be entirely levelled with the ground, as nothing short of this could purify it from its abominations; and then afterwards it would be rebuilt, free from those defilements, a holy city, as in former ages.

15 ¶ Also the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

16 Son of man, behold, I take away from thee [h] the desire of thine eyes [i] with a stroke: [k] yet neither shalt thou mourn nor weep, neither shall [l] thy tears * run down.

V. 12, 13. Jerusalem had wearied herself, (or wearied God,) with lies. At a great expense, and with much labour, she had followed after idols, which were lying vanities; she had sought the assistance of her heathen neighbours who deceived her; and she had professed to worship JEHOVAH, when it was mere hypocrisy. As no reformation took place, the Lord would consume her iniquity by his fiery vengeance. Her idolatry was no occasional offence, the effect of peculiar circumstances of temptation: but it was the result of a violent depraved propensity; an enmity to God and his holy worship; and a strong attachment to the sensual rites and worshippers of abominable idols: as the unfaithfulness of an adulterous wife is proved to arise from a rooted licentiousness of heart, when she grows more dissolute amidst all means used to reclaim her. The Lord had used various methods to cure the Jews of idolatry, by reforming kings, holy prophets, and awful judgments; but they still continued obstinately attached to idols: they would therefore at length be given up to ruin; and nothing further would be done for their reformation till the Lord had caused his fury to rest upon them. (Note, Hos. iv. 16—19.)

V. 14. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 16—18. This was the last message which the prophet carried to the captives, respecting the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple; and it was introduced by a very afflictive dispensation to himself. The Lord informed him previously, that he would "take away the desire of "his eyes with a stroke;" that is, his wife, whom he greatly loved, and whom we may suppose to have been in every respect worthy of his endeared affection, and a great comfort to him amidst his heavy trials: yet the Lord would take her from him by a sudden stroke, without any intervening sickness, which would aggravate the pain of this great affliction. Yet he was commanded to avoid every outward expression of sorrow: he was not allowed to shed tears, or to make any outcry, or to use any of the customary tokens of mourning: he was required to wear his turban, or bonnet, and his shoes, as usual; and not to cover his lips, the sign of silent distress. He was not allowed to eat the bread, which was commonly sent on such occasions to the mourners by their friends; as supposing their minds too full of perturbation to make provision for themselves; and perhaps consisting of such things as were deemed to correspond with their afflicted state, or suited to minister to their comfort. Accordingly, by the grace of God, he was enabled to acquiesce in the divine will, in this trying dispensation: and after having received this distressing information, he went to speak to the people, and to notify to them the affliction that was coming upon him, and the manner in which he was ordered to behave under it. For at even his wife died, and the next morning he was enabled openly to conform his conduct to the divine command, though it would probably expose him to the censure of being insensible, and devoid of tender affections.

pitieth; and [y] your sons and your daughters whom ye have left shall fall by the sword.

22 And [z] ye shall do as I have done: ye shall not cover your lips, nor eat the bread of men.

23 And your tires shall be upon your heads, and your shoes upon your feet: ye shall not mourn nor weep; [a] but ye shall pine away for your iniquities, [b] and mourn one toward another.

24 Thus [c] Ezekiel is unto you a sign: according to all that he hath done shall ye do; and [d] when this cometh, [e] ye shall know that I am the Lord God.

25 ¶ Also, thou son of man, shall it not be in the day when I take from them [f] their strength, the joy of their glory, the desire of their eyes, and that * whereupon they set their minds, [g] their sons and their daughters,

V. 19—24. Some of the people would inquire the prophet's meaning, in derision or censoriousness; but others would suppose that he thus intended to fix their attention on his instructions: and their inquiry gave him an opportunity of delivering the message of God to them. He had determined to profane his temple, which had been the chief defence, distinction, and honour of their nation; and which the idolatrous Jews still presumed upon as their safeguard, and gloried in as their pride: nor could they bear to hear or think that it would ever be destroyed by the heathen. At the same time, the remainder of their children, the objects of their tenderest affection and compassion, would be slain before their eyes. And then they would imitate the prophet, when he had been bereaved of his most valuable earthly comfort: they would not show any of the ordinary tokens of sorrow; either lest they should give umbrage to the haughty victors; or because their troubles came upon them in such quick succession, that they had not space for lamenting each of them: or because their personal sorrows were swallowed up in the calamities of the nation; or the multitudes, who had cause to lament, would render particular instances of affliction less noticed; or in short, their griefs would be too big for utterance. So that in sullen and stubborn desperation, without even the relief of freely giving vent to their sorrows, they would pine away in unrepented and unpardoned iniquities, or only fretfully complain and repine one to another in private. Though this was addressed to the captives, yet it related to the general concerns of the nation. For the prophet suffered this heavy affliction, in this composed manner, to be a sign unto them of their approaching condition and conduct; when they would know the power, truth, and justice of the Lord, by the accomplishment of these terrible predictions.

V. 25—27. When the city and temple should be destroyed, all the nobles and valiant men, that were the strength, confidence, boast, and rejoicing of the Jews, should be cut off; and their valuable treasures, and still more valued children, torn from them: the Lord would send one of those who had escaped the sword, to inform the prophet. Then his mouth would be again opened to speak with him that brought the tidings, concerning the affairs of the nation: and the people would perceive by the event that he had been a sign unto them, to make them know and fear the Lord. In the mean time he would be dumb, as to the Jews, and would not deliver any prophecies to them, during the continuance of the siege; though employed to deliver several predictions concerning the neighbouring nations. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—14.

The times before appointed, for the condign punishment of ungodly men, may seem to approach slowly, but they will certainly and speedily arrive. In the mean while it behooves the ministers of God to use every method of exciting the attention and awakening the consciences, of the careless and obstinate, to a sense of their guilt and danger. —The refuges to which impenitent rebels flee for safety, are often the occasions or the scenes of their destruction.— Men weary themselves far more in the pursuit of lying vanities, either in open wickedness, or hypocrisy, or superstition, than they need to do in seeking happiness and salvation in the service of God, and in the method of the Gospel. Some sinners are longer spared than others: but unless they repent and be converted, they will all perish, without respect to rank, abilities, or reputation.— The wrath of God is sufficient to convert any place into a hell, for the torment of his obstinate enemies: even as his favour and consolations can change a dungeon into a heaven, for the benefit of his suffering servants. They who are shameless in their crimes, shall be rendered infamous in their punishment: and all the innocent blood, which ambitious warriors, cruel tyrants, oppressors, or persecutors have gloried in shedding, shall soon be required at their hands. When the instructions of God's word and the chastenings of his rod, leave men hardened in impenitence, he often condemns them "to continue filthy still;" and their filthiness will then no more be purged, till he hath caused his fury to rest upon them to their final destruction. However infidels may despise the denunciations of God's word, he will certainly accomplish them, and not go back, nor spare, nor repent; but will judge sinners according to their ways and their doings.

Prophecies against Ammon, 1—7; Moab and Edom, 8—14; and Philistia, 15—17.

THE word of the LORD came again unto me, saying,

2 Son of man, [a] set thy face against [b] the Ammonites, and prophesy against them;

3 And say unto the Ammonites, Hear the word of the Lord GOD; Thus saith the Lord GOD, Because [c] thou saidst, Aha, against my sanctuary, when it was profaned; and against the land of Israel, when it was desolate; and against the house of Judah, when they went into captivity;

4 Behold, therefore I will deliver thee to the * men [d] of the east for a possession; and they shall set their palaces in thee, and make their dwellings in thee: [e] they shall eat thy fruit, and they shall drink thy milk.

5 And I will make [f] Rabbah [g] a stable for camels, and the Ammonites a couching-place for flocks: [h] and ye shall know that I am the LORD.

6 For thus saith the Lord GOD; Because thou hast clapped thine † hands, and [k] stamped with the ‡ feet, and [d] rejoiced in § heart with all thy despite against the land of Israel;

7 Behold, therefore, [m] I will stretch out mine hand upon thee, [n] and will deliver thee for ‖ a spoil to the heathen; and I will cut thee off from the people, and I will cause thee to perish out of the countries: I will destroy thee; and thou shalt know that I am the LORD.

V. 15—27.

Marriage is honourable in all, not excepting either priests or prophets, or the most eminent servants of God: and an amiable and pious wife is justly valued and rejoiced in, as one of the chief of created comforts. Yet this honourable and endeared affection must be subordinated to the love, and submitted to the will, of God. The faith which influenced Abraham to sacrifice his beloved Isaac, will cause us to submit patiently, should the Lord take away the desire of our eyes by a sudden stroke: for he hath a right to recal every loan, and is able to make up every loss to us. We cannot expect to retain very long our most valued earthly comforts; and should continually be seeking for grace, to enable us properly to bear such separating strokes: yet are we sure that our sovereign God will not take our relatives from us, without some wise and good reason. But should he see it conducive to his own glory, to our good, or the good of our brethren, to make us examples of suffering affliction and of patience: if our hearts be in a proper frame, we shall say, "Thy will be done;" and shall find his grace sufficient for us. Nature must indeed feel exquisitely: but Christians should be careful not to sorrow as men without hope, or to copy the vehement language and expressions of grief, that are in use among those who know not God: and ministers especially should always endeavour so to moderate their passions on trying occasions, that they may be instructive examples to the numbers, who have their eyes upon them. They must not deviate from their duty to follow the fashions of a vain world: nor is it expedient to omit their work on account of personal troubles; for it hath often been observed, that their words on such occasions have proved peculiarly useful to the hearers. Every dispensation of Providence, and every action of the eminent servants of God, should lead us to inquire what we may learn from them; and it is very desirable, that the conduct of ministers should excite the people to hear the word of God from them. His ordinances, and the welfare of his Church, should be dearer to our hearts than our nearest relatives: for they are the excellency of the strength, and the most honourable and joyful distinction of every nation, that truly values them. But when men abuse and pollute divine institutions by their crimes; and yet confide in the outward form, as entitling them to acceptance and protection; the Lord will take away these privileges, or pour contempt upon them. Yet after all the scriptural examples of this truth, men still continue to confide and glory in externals, who yet hate the power of godliness! But if the case of sinners, under great temporal calamities, who remain unhumbled and desperate, and pine away in their iniquities, be very dreadful: what will be the case of those "whose worm "never dieth, and whose fire is not quenched?" Blessed be God, we need not thus pine away in any of our present afflictions: for should all comforts fail and all sorrows combine against us; yet the broken heart and the mourner's prayer are always accepted before our God. Mourning before him, confessing our sins, and seeking his help and grace, we need not despond, and shall not be left comfortless, in any situation during life, or in the approaching agonies of death.

CHAP. XXV. V. 2. 'Look thou towards the 'coast of the Ammonites, and in this posture do thou 'prophesy against them.' (Bp. Hall.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3—7. The enmity of the Ammonites, Moabites, and Edomites against the Jews, seems to have originated from ancient competitions, and from covetous desires of their possessions; but it was augmented by their hatred of God and of his worship. They therefore rejoiced over the profanation and destruction of the temple, as well as over the miseries of the people and the desolation of the land: and they expressed their insulting triumph in the most 13 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD; [b] I will also stretch out mine hand upon Edom, [c] and will cut off man and beast from it; and I will make it desolate from [d] Teman; and they § of Dedan shall fall by the sword.

14 And I will lay my vengeance upon Edom [e] by the hand of my people Israel: and they shall do in Edom according to mine anger, and according to my fury; [f] and they shall know my vengeance, saith the Lord GOD.

indecent manner; as if they meant to encourage the Chaldeans in the work of carnage and destruction. The Lord therefore reminded them, (for it is probable, that these predictions would be sent to them or heard of by them;) that he was about to deliver them also into the hands of their enemies to be destroyed. It is likely, that Nebuchadnezzar subjugated the Ammonites some time after the destruction of Jerusalem: that the Arabians, and other nations to the east of Judah, took possession of their cities and enjoyed the fruit of their lands: and that they made Rabbah their head-quarters, and there kept their camels and folded their flocks, of which they possessed vast multitudes. The Ammonites have long since perished from being a distinct nation: and the performance of these predictions was suited to convince the survivors, that JEHOVAH was indeed the only living and true God. 'By the men of the 'east may be meant the Chaldeans. Ammon is reckoned 'among the countries which God foretold by Jeremiah, 'should be delivered into the hands of the king of Babylon.') (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 8. Judah had been distinguished from other nations, by the peculiar protection of JEHOVAH, as well as by the temple, and the worship there performed; but their idolatries had rendered them like the nations: and their calamities terminating in the destruction of their city and temple, seemed to indicate, that the Lord either could not or would not protect them any longer. Thus they appeared to be made like to the heathen; and Moab and Edom were greatly rejoiced at it.

V. 9. 'I will make a passage for his enemies to invade 'his frontier-cities, and from thence to possess themselves 'of the best of his country.' (Lowth.)

V. 10, 11. "To the sons of the east, with the sons "of Ammon, I have even given it for a possession; in "order that the sons of Ammon may no longer be remembered among the nations. And I will," &c. The ruin of Moab would deprive the Ammonites of every resource, and be one means of their sinking into neglect and oblivion. Thus both Ammon and Moab, who were nearly related, and generally supported each other, would be desolated together by the same powerful enemies.

V. 12. The Lord had given the peculiar blessing to Jacob, in preference to Esau; Jacob had grievously offended Esau by his conduct in that matter; and Esau's resentment had been transmitted to his posterity. The Israelites and Jews had also obtained many advantages over the Edomites; who watched their opportunity of taking vengeance for them, when the Jews were in distress, and especially when they were crushed by the power of the Chaldeans: but in so doing they highly offended the God of Israel, and brought his terrible vengeance upon themselves. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 14. By the hand, &c. Judas Maccabæus, and afterwards Hyrcanus, vanquished the Edomites, and at length reduced them entirely into subjection to the Jews: and thus that revengeful nation was made to know the vengeance of God, by the hand of his people Israel.

V. 15. The Philistines were a remnant of the old inhabitants of Canaan; and from the days of Joshua they had hated Israel, and had been for ages very formidable enemies: but having been at length reduced, they were not able to express their hatred, till the Jews were subdued by the Chaldeans; and then they assisted them to cut off the fugitives. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 16. Cherethims, &c. Either the Cherethims were a tribe of the ancient Canaanites, bordering on the Philistines; or this is merely another name, by which the Philistines were known. "The remnant" seems to mean the inhabitants of Ashdod, which had been almost destroyed. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The hatred, which ungodly men bear to true religion, is so excessive, that they can rejoice in the desolations of the Church and the calamities of her children, even when ruin impends over them from the same quarter! Though God acts with perfect wisdom and justice, in permitting the profanation of his sanctuary, and the troubles of his professed worshippers, being influenced by abhorrence of their sins, and zeal for his own glory, yet their enemies are induced by far other motives, when they triumph and insult over them in such circumstances. They who rejoice at the calamities of their neighbours, out of avarice, ambition, resentment, or malignity, will be exposed to judgments for it: but they that rejoice with great delight in the afflictions of God's people, out of hatred to his truth and worship, may expect that he will stretch forth his hand against them, as his personal enemies. Gladly would such persons see the Church entirely destroyed, and made in character and circumstances like the rest of the world: but, notwithstanding all her corruptions and afflictions, a vast difference still remains, and will continue to the end of the world, and to all eternity. When rapacious men are about to seize upon the possessions of others, they often are deprived of their own: and such as disdain the afflicted will soon sink into contempt. Vengeance belongeth unto God; they who without his commission revenge themselves, greatly offend, and will be made to know his vengeance: and they who treasure up the old hatred, and watch for their opportunity of manifesting it, are "treasuring up for themselves wrath against the day "of wrath, and revelation of the righteous judgment of God.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVI. V. 1. It is probable that this was the first day of the first month of that year, in which Jerusalem was taken; though the month is not mentioned. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2. The Tyrians seem not to have had any peculiar enmity against the Jewish religion or nation: but they were merchants, whose object was to extend their commerce; and they supposed that the ruin of Jerusalem would tend to their advantage; they hoped to draw to themselves the trade with those people, that had been used to frequent the gates of Jerusalem; and thus to be replenished, when she was laid waste. 'There was a great 'confluence of people to Jerusalem at the solemn feasts, 'as well of Jews as proselytes. When Jerusalem was 'taken, the spoil of the city was carried,' to Tyre 'for 'sale: and probably many of the inhabitants, being made 'captives, were sold there for slaves, a traffic the Tyrians 'dealt in very much.' (xxvii. 13. Joel iii. 2—6.) (Lowth.) 'Thus the wicked rejoice at their fall, by whom they may 'have any profit.'

V. 3—6. This chapter and the two following contain a very copious prophecy against Tyre, which was one of the most ancient cities in the world, and for many ages one of the most flourishing; being the centre of commerce betwixt the east and the west, and the grand emporium of the earth. Such predictions have generally been accomplished in a gradual manner: and whilst some more signal and near event was particularly foretold, they contained also expressions, which related to more remote futurity. It had been foretold by Isaiah, that Tyre, after having been destroyed by the Chaldeans, would at length recover her prosperity, and that the Tyrians would be converted to Christianity: (Notes, &c. Isaiah xxiii.) The total and final ruin of that city could not be effected, till those prophecies had been fulfilled: yet that also was clearly predicted, and has accordingly been exactly accomplished. We may therefore interpret these verses as a summary prediction of those events which would take place, during a long succession of ages: and thus we at this day, possess a fuller demonstration, that Ezekiel wrote by divine inspiration, than his contemporaries had; for what man could have thought of so entire a destruction of such a flourishing city, as is here predicted, and has accordingly happened? The Lord, being against Tyre, declared that he would cause many nations to come up against her. This may mean the Chaldean army, composed with troops from several nations: but it seems rather to intend the Chaldeans, Macedonians and other nations, who successively weakened, and have at length totally desolated Tyre. These would bear down all before them, like an inundation of the sea: and not only destroy her walls and towers; but even reduce the ground, on which the city stood, to a bare and barren rock, a place for the spreading of nets, like some rocks found in the midst of the sea. The spoil and trade of Tyre would also be divided among many nations; and the dependent towns and villages, in the adjacent country, would fall before her by the sword of the conquerors. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9—11. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12. A spoil, &c. Though the Tyrians had carried off their most valued treasures; so that Nebuchadnezzar, when he took the city after thirteen years' siege, was greatly disappointed as to the value of the plunder: yet there could not but be great quantities of spoil left in so rich a city. (Note, xxix. 17—20.)

V. 13. 'Great cities are full of all kinds of gayety and 'luxury: this shall be turned into a melancholy silence.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 14. 'It has been commonly said, that when old 'Tyre was closely besieged, and was near falling into the 'hands of the enemy, that the Tyrians fled from thence, 'and built new Tyre on the island: but the learned 'Vitringa hath proved at large from good authorities, 'that New Tyre was founded several ages before, and was 'the station for ships.' (Bp. Newton.) It was, however, the city on the continent which Nebuchadnezzar destroyed, and this was never rebuilt. 'He rased the whole to the 'ground, and slew all found therein. After this it never 'recovered its former glory; not rising any higher than 'to become a village by the name of old Tyre.' 'The 'city on the island became the Tyre, afterwards so famous 'by that name.' (Prideaux.) At length Alexander the great used the ruins of the city on the continent, to make a way across the narrow sea to the city on the island, when he besieged it; and this tended to render the site of old Tyre like the top of a rock; and then her stones were cast into the midst of the water, (12.) And in process of time the city on the island was also entirely desolated.

V. 15. The isles, &c. The countries of Europe bordering on the Mediterranean, which traded with Tyre and where her colonies were established, seem here to be principally intended. They were greatly interested in her fate, which must have exceedingly affected their trade and prosperity: probably they had much wealth in the hands of the Tyrian merchants, and in the warehouses of that city, when it was destroyed; and the fall of so prosperous a city, and the miseries endured by her inhabitants, were sufficient to make all others tremble for themselves, as well as mourn over her.

V. 16. (Marg. Ref.) The consternation, occasioned by the fall of Tyre, is described in language peculiarly impressive and affecting.

V. 17, 18. Terror, &c. Though the Tyrians never made extensive conquests by land; yet they claimed the sovereignty of the seas, and often made those who frequented them tremble, by their powerful fleets and superior skill in naval affairs: but they would at length cause them to tremble by their unexpected fall.

Departure. 'When thy people shall be carried captive.' (Lowth.) Or, when they fled from the city, and emigrated to other countries.

V. 19. Bring, &c. The destruction of Tyre is here compared to a shipwreck. (Note, xxvii. 26—36.)

V. 20. Tyre would at length be so entirely destroyed, that her prosperity would no more be remembered, than men are when they have long been dead and buried. This would be at the time "when the LORD should set glory "in the land of the living:" which may either mean, the display of his glory in the fulfilment of this prediction, or in the restoration of the Jews to their own land: or it may refer to the coming of Christ, and the establishment of the Gospel. Some make Tyre a type of Rome, the New Testament-Babylon, or antichrist; at whose destruction the Lord will set glory in the land of the living, by making his cause triumphant all over the earth. (Notes, Rev. xviii—xx.)

V. 21. 'These prophecies, like most others, were to 'receive their completion by degrees: Nebuchadnezzar 'destroyed the old city; and Alexander employed the 'ruins, in making his causey to the Island. It may be 'questioned, whether the new city ever arose to that 'height of power, wealth, and greatness, to which it was 'elevated in the times of Isaiah and Ezekiel. Alexander, 'by building Alexandria in Egypt, deprived it of much of 'its trade. It had the misfortune afterwards of changing 'its masters often; being sometimes in the hands of the 'Ptolemies kings of Egypt, and sometimes of the Seleucidæ kings of Syria; till at length it fell under the 'dominion of the Romans. It was taken by the Saracens 'about the year after Christ 639: it was retaken by the 'Christians, in the year 1134. From the Christians it 'was taken by the Mamalucks of Egypt, 1229: from 'them it was taken by the Turks, 1516, under whose 'dominion it continues at present. But, alas, how fallen, 'how changed, from what it was formerly! It is now 'become a heap of ruins, visited only by the boats of a 'few poor fishermen.' (Bp. Newton on the Prophecies.) 'On the north side it hath an old Turkish ungarrisoned 'castle: besides which you see nothing here, but a mere 'Babel of broken walls, pillars, vaults, &c. there being not 'so much as one entire house left: its present inhabitants 'are only a few poor wretches, harbouring themselves in 'the vaults, and subsisting chiefly upon fishing, who seem 'to be preserved in this place by divine Providence, as a 'visible argument, how God hath fulfilled his word con-'cerning Tyre, viz. that it should be as the top of a rock, 'a place for fishers to dry their nets on.' (Maundrell's Journal.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—14.

Many maxims, current in the commercial world, are diametrically opposite to the law of God, which requires us to love our neighbour as ourselves: for the selfish love of gain influences men to rejoice in the calamities of others, even of cities and nations, that interfere with this leading object; especially if they can hope to grow rich when others are impoverished. But God will show himself to be against such mercenary selfish traders, whose hearts grow callous to every humane feeling, through the love of riches. How then must he abhor those who increase their wealth by the sweat and blood of their brethren, whom they violently enslave and cruelly oppress for this only reason! Men have little cause to glory in those precarious advantages, which excite the envy and rapacity of other covetous persons, and are continually shifting from one to another; and in getting, keeping, and spending of which, they provoke that God, whose wrath turns joyous cities into ruinous heaps. Thus his justice is displayed and his purposes effected from age to age: and none can say how soon the most powerful and wealthy resorts of commerce, may become like Tyre, a place for the spreading of nets, and a spoil to the nations. We have abundant cause for gratitude on account of that exemption from war in our land, with which we are favoured; and to pray that it may be continued to us and our posterity: for the condition of invaded countries, and besieged and plundered cities, is most dreadful. Indeed nothing can reconcile the humane reflecting Christian to the horrors and carnage of war: but the consideration, that the righteous Lord is thus displaying his glory, and making way for the establishment of his kingdom of truth and holiness.

V. 15—21.

They who carefully study the Scriptures, will derive advantage even from the desolations of war, through successive generations and in the most distant regions; as they will thence deduce still fuller proof of the divine inspiration of that sacred book, which is the rule of their conduct and the foundation of their hope; every discovery of a remarkable fulfilment of any scripture-prophecy, is like an evident miracle wrought before their eyes for the confirmation of their faith; and this evidence is continually accumulating upon them, in connexion "with the witness "in themselves" which they enjoy in their own experience. Being thus instructed and established in the faith, we should use redoubled diligence, to obtain and possess the full assurance of our citizenship in that city, which hath immoveable foundations, unalienable treasures and joys increasing and eternal, and which no enemies can destroy. All else is vanity and vexation: they, who now terrify others by their power, may soon astonish them by their fall: they, who have now the most established prosperity, will soon be as dead men, out of sight and forgotten: and the wicked will not only go down into the grave, but into the bottomless pit of destruction. But the glory of God, the preservation and prosperity of his Church, and the everlasting salvation of his people, will be promoted by the destruction of all who oppose them.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVII. V. 2. 'This alludes to the mournful ditties used at funerals, wherein the mourning 'women recounted every thing that was valuable or 'praise-worthy belonging to the deceased, and then lamented his loss.'

V. 3, 4. Tyre was situated upon the Mediterranean sea, and formed the nearest entrance to it from the interior of Asia. It was therefore every way conveniently placed, to unite in commerce Asia, Africa, and Europe, the whole of the known world at that time: especially it was the centre for the trade of Asia and the East Indies, with the many isles and countries of Europe. Old Tyre was built upon the sea-coast on the continent; the new city was upon an island about half a mile from the shore. In both, the builders had done their utmost to render every thing commodious, elegant, and magnificent, in the greatest degree: so that they seem to have perfected their beauty. Of these improvements in architecture, and in every thing connected with the most extensive trade and the most abundant prosperity, the Tyrians were become exceedingly proud: and they thought their city a perfect model, and superior to all others in the world. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5—9. In the subsequent description of the navigation and commerce of Tyre, the critics and antiquarians have found much employment; but a few brief hints must suffice in this place. The whole is suited to give us the most enlarged idea of the wealth, luxury, and extensive commerce of this renowned city: and to render the prediction of its ruin and its accomplishment, the more affecting and instructive. The Tyrians or Phenicians (for Tyre was the principal city of Phenicia,) were accounted the inventors of navigation; and it is certain, that they carried it to greater perfection than any of the ancients. We are here informed, that the planks for their shipping or the decks of their ships were of fir, brought from Shenir, or mount Hermon: their masts were made of the cedars of Lebanon; their oars, (for oars as well as sails were used in most, if not all, of the ships of the ancients,) were of the oaks of Bashan: so that the land of Israel supplied the Tyrians with timber for ships, though the Israelites built but few themselves. The Tyrians were also furnished with benches of ivory, or inlaid with ivory, by the company of the Ashurites. As ivory was brought out of the interior parts of Asia; and as Chittim signifies the countries adjacent to the Mediterranean sea; it is probable, either that some Europeans imported the ivory, and sold the benches when made to the Tyrians, or that artificers came to Tyre to manufacture them. But it does not appear how the Assyrians could be said to make these benches; and the clause is rendered by some, of box-wood inlaid with ivory. See also the margin. The fine linen of Egypt, which was renowned throughout the world, and richly embroidered too, was used by the Tyrians for their sails: or rather for their flags or colours, as the original may be rendered: for it can scarcely be conceived that their sails were generally formed of such materials; though such extravagance might occasionally be used in an ostentatious display of wealth and magnificence. Their clothes, or the tents and canopies upon the decks of their galleys, were formed of cloth of blue and purple from the isles of the Egean sea, or the Grecian colonies near the coast of Asia Minor. Purple was called the Tyrian colour: yet they were not contented with their own manufactures, but luxuriously used that, which was brought from far and at a great price. They had mariners from Zidon, the mother-city and from Arvad an island in Phenicia: who did the laborious work on board their ships; whilst the Tyrians, being very skilful in navigation, acted only as pilots, or occupied the more honourable departments. The inhabitants of Gebal, a promontory in Phenicia, having been long skilful and experienced, in closing the joinings of the ships to prevent leaks, or in stopping them when made, were retained for this service: whilst ships and mariners from all nations came to Tyre to purchase their merchandise, and to dispose of their own for it. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10, 11. The Tyrians were themselves chiefly employed in navigation and commerce, and in enjoying their affluence: but it was requisite that they should have forces ready to oppose hostile assailants. They had therefore an army of men, hired from Persia, Lydia, and Lybia; whose martial appearance and armour added to the comeliness of the city. The island of Arvad furnished them with soldiers to guard their walls, as well as with mariners; and the Gammadims, who perhaps inhabited some part of Phenicia, garrisoned their towers; and their glittering shields, being hung upon the walls, made them have a still more magnificent appearance. (Marg. Ref.) The Lydians in Asia seem to have descended from Shem: but Ludim is placed among the sons of Misraim, the son of Ham: and as Lud and Phut are elsewhere named together, it is probable that some tribe in Africa is meant; perhaps the Abyssinians. The conjectures about the Gammadims are altogether unsatisfactory.

V. 12—25. We have here a particular account of the nations or cities, that traded with Tyre, and the commodities which they brought to her markets. Thus Tarshish, or Tartessus in Spain, as it is supposed) exchanged various metals, (which were either the produce of that country or fetched from others,) for the rich luxuries of the eastern world. It is probable that the tin was brought from Britain, (out of Cornwall,) which was first known to the ancients, as yielding great quantities of that metal. The different parts of Greece, or the regions about the Euxine and Caspian seas, sold slaves, and vessels of brass to the Tyrians. Togarmah, or Phrygia, Cappadocia, or some of the regions in Asia Minor, supplied them with horses and mules, and with servants skilful in managing them. The inhabitants of Dedan, supposed to be in Arabia, traded with them; and many isles or countries of Europe, bought of the Tyrians the goods which they brought them: especially their horns of ivory, or rather, horns, ivory and ebony, i. e. the horns of some curious animals, ivory which is the teeth of elephants, and ebony, a very hard and valuable wood. These they brought for a present to the Tyrians, or rather as the price of the goods which they purchased. "Many isles bought the merchandise of thy "hand," &c. (15.) The Syrians bought the manufactures, which the Tyrians made in abundance, and paid for them with precious stones and other articles of luxury. The land of Judah and Israel had no precious stones or metals to exchange, (though it was the glory of all lands,) but it supplied them with what was more valuable, namely, abundance of good wheat, honey, oil, and balm used in medicine: (it is uncertain whether Pannag be the name of a place, or of some valued production of Canaan.) Damascus changed the wine of Helbon, and white wool, which were both in great repute, for the useful manufactures of Tyre. The inhabitants of Dan and Javan, (probably not the city Dan in the coasts of Israel, nor any part of Greece as before, but cities in the east,) brought polished iron or steel, with rich spices to Tyre, to exchange for the commodities of the western world: as another Dedan, (probably in Idumea,) did rich cloths to ornament or line their chariots. Some districts of Arabia supplied Tyre with cattle; others with spices, gold, and precious stones. —The inhabitants of Mesopotamia, Media, and the adjacent regions, traded with Tyre, bringing chests of all kinds of rich apparel. In short, all the ships which sailed on the sea, and which were generally called "the ships of "Tarshish," celebrated the praises of Tyre: that city was replenished with all kinds of riches, and made glorious with all earthly decorations and magnificence. Upon a review of this account of the commerce of Tyre, it is plain that that city traded with every part of the then known world, either immediately, or through the medium of other nations. (Marg. Ref.) at sea, and wrecked through the mismanagement of her pilots and rowers. When the rulers of Tyre provoked Nebuchadnezzar to make war upon them, and when they pertinaciously resolved to withstand that haughty conqueror, they rowed this gallant ship into perilous waters; and when the city was taken, it was "broken by the east-wind in "the midst of the seas." The same was the case in the time of Alexander the great, and in those subsequent disasters, which terminated in the total ruin of Tyre. Thus the inhabitants and riches of Tyre, like the crew and cargo of a broken ship, sunk into the midst of the seas. The cry of the leading men in Tyre, when they saw that the city must be taken; (like that of pilots, when they perceive that the ship must sink,) would be heard in the extreme parts of the city, or even on the adjacent continent. All the rowers and mariners of the ships that had used to trade to Tyre, would come on shore to witness the fatal catastrophe, and would express their extreme sorrow by every significant token; and with great astonishment and deep regret contrast the former prosperity of Tyre, when kings and nations were enriched by her, with her present condition, now that she was utterly broken and ruined. But whilst most kings and nations would be astonished and troubled, some merchants would triumph and insult over her, (as she had done over Jerusalem:) expecting to be replenished, now she was laid waste. The whole of this is so correspondent to the lamentation made over the fall of the New Testament-Babylon, or Rome, that we cannot but suppose, there was something typical in the fall of Tyre. (Marg. Ref.) 'The vicissitudes of time, or rather the 'barbarism of the Greeks of the lower empire, and the 'Mahometants, have accomplished this prediction. In'stead of that ancient commerce, so active and so exten'sive, Sour, (Tyre,) reduced to a miserable village, has 'no other trade than the exportation of a few sacks of 'corn and raw cotton, nor any merchant but a single 'Greek factor, who scarcely makes sufficient profit to 'maintain his family.' (Volney.) This extract is taken from the writings of one, who published the observations which he made on the spot; and who was very far indeed from favouring the cause of revelation.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—25.

Whilst there are persons and books in abundance, ready to instruct us concerning the advantages of extensive commerce, about which the inhabitants of these nations are neither ignorant nor indifferent; it would be well, if more regard were paid to those Scriptures, which point out the sins and dangers, to which men are exposed by it. We should be thankful for our situation at the entrance of the seas, which renders our land as convenient a centre of modern, as Tyre was of ancient, commerce: and we possess singular advantages as an island for excluding foreign invaders, as well as for a friendly intercourse with all the nations of the earth. At the same time we should by no means forget the wisdom and goodness of the Creator, in so dispensing his liberality, that each country has its valuable productions, which it can spare to other nations: and it would be happy for mankind, if the mutual destruction of wars were more generally exchanged for the reciprocal advantages of commerce, till all nations were united in one common bond of amity and mutual utility. It is also worthy our notice, how many things of small value in themselves, are, by manufactures and commerce, rendered the means of honest industry and subsistence to many thousands. Yet commerce, beneficial as it is, hath its peculiar dangers and evils. Alas, that modern commerce, and even that of this favoured land, should have occasioned perhaps the shedding of more human blood, than the destructive wars of sanguinary conquerors! But we hope that God will ere long raise up to us a number of humane and philanthropic legislators to terminate these hateful abuses; and to establish such regulations, as shall render our commerce conducive to the happiness of the most distant nations, as well as to that of our own; otherwise, whatever profane politicians may imagine, our prosperity will soon be broken, like a ship-wrecked vessel. It is obvious likewise, that commerce tends to increase men's wants and inordinate gratifications, and their pride, self-confidence, and vain glory: as if it rendered cities and nations, perfect in beauty and sufficient for their own prosperity, independent of the providence of God. Too often men, eagerly pursuing riches, neglect justice, truth, and humanity; and deem every measure justifiable that proves lucrative, and every thing glorious that is prosperous. Yet more merchants and traders are just, generous, and benevolent, than humble, pious, and devoted to God. When riches increase, the possessors are apt to set their hearts upon them, and to forget the Lord, who alone giveth them power to get wealth: they prefer the wisdom of this world, to that which is from above: they study the ledger more than the bible: extending their trade is a far greater object in their view, than the propagation of the Gospel: religion is made subservient to worldly interest; and the maxims of the counting-house are employed in bartering for church-livings, and in managing designs, professedly intended for pious and charitable purposes. The beauty of holiness and the peculiar privileges of the children of God, have no splendour in their eyes, compared with large estates, fair houses elegantly furnished, and all the indulgence of pride and luxury, and of that avarice by which they are supported. And thus the religion, morals, and maxims of nations are corrupted and debauched: the sinews of their strength are relaxed, their policy degenerates into craft, and their counsels into mercenary sophistry.

engage in rash projects and destructive wars: and thus prosperous states are reduced and ruined; their grandeur only tends to enhance the greatness of their fall: many spectators lament over, and are astonished at their ruin; and others triumph in it and rise to prosperity, whilst they are no more. 'Trade is a fluctuating thing: it passed 'from Tyre to Alexandria, from Alexandria to Venice, 'from Venice to Antwerp, from Antwerp to Amsterdam 'and London; the English rivalling the Dutch, as the 'French are now rivalling both. It behooves those who 'are in possession of it, to take the greatest care they do 'not lose it. Liberty is a friend to it, as it is a friend to 'liberty. But the greatest enemy to both is licentiousness, 'which tramples on all law, encourages riots and tumults, 'promotes drunkenness and debauchery, sticks at nothing 'to supply its extravagance, practices every art of illicit 'gain, ruins credit, ruins trade, and will in the end ruin 'liberty itself. Neither kingdoms nor commonwealths, 'neither public companies nor private persons, can long 'carry on a beneficial flourishing trade, without virtue, 'and what virtue teacheth, sobriety, industry, frugality, 'modesty, honesty, punctuality, humanity, charity, the 'love of our country, and the fear of God. The prophets 'will inform us, how the Tyrians lost it; and the like 'causes will always produce the like effects.' (Bp. Newton.) Whatever may be the case with the community, individuals may guard against these evils in themselves: and their immortal interests call them to it more forcibly than any temporal motives can do. If we be poor, we should learn to be contented with food and raiment; and having the needful provisions of Judah and Israel, we need not covet the superfluities of Tyre. They who engage in commerce, should remember that they are the servants of God, and learn to conduct their business, according to the precepts of his word, in submission to his providence, and with an aim to his glory. And they who possess wealth, should remember, that they are his stewards, and must not waste his goods, in gratifying "the "lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, or the pride of "life;" but should use them in "doing good to all men, "especially to the household of faith," and in promoting the Christian religion. Above all, we should be careful to "seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness," and to do and use every thing in subserviency to the salvation of our souls. Then our riches will never be taken from us; and when we shall be no more on earth, we shall go to possess an incorruptible and unchangeable inheritance in heaven.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVIII. V. 2—5. Ethbaal or Ithobalus was the prince or king of Tyre at the time when this prophecy was spoken, and when the city was taken by Nebuchadnezzar. He seems to have been a man of eminent abilities, and under his government the Tyrians for a time prospered exceedingly. But being lifted up with the most excessive pride, he arrogated divine honours to himself, as many vain-glorious monarchs have done. His sovereignty over the seas was so uncontrolled, and his authority was so firmly established, that he seemed to himself to reign as a god in the midst of the seas; and to be placed on the throne of God, rather than on that of a man. Yet was he a poor frail mortal man, and not God, though he affected to be absolute, independent, and honoured as a deity. Daniel, who was at this time not more than thirty-six years of age, being employed in the court of the king of Babylon, had become exceedingly renowned for his wisdom in all the concerns of government, as well as in interpreting dreams, and resolving difficult questions: but the king of Tyre supposed himself to be wiser than he, and that no secret could be hid from him. He was perhaps a man of learning, and understood many abstruse subjects; or he had discovered the secret machinations of his enemies, which he ascribed to his own discernment, and supposed that nothing could elude his penetration. But the chief use of his wisdom was to increase his revenues and treasures, by protecting the trade and wealth of his subjects. This he ascribed to his own wise counsels; and thus his riches tended in every way to enhance his pride and self-sufficiency. (Is. xlvii. 7—10.)

V. 6—10. "Thou didst think in thine heart, that thou "wast equal with God." (Old Tr.) (John v. 18. Phil. ii. 6.) This haughty prince was become the rival of the Lord of Hosts, and robbed him of his glory; who therefore resolved to resist and abase him. The Chaldeans were not numbered among the people who traded with the Tyrians, but were strangers; yet the Lord had chosen them to execute his sentence against that city and her king. They were the most terrible of the nations, and would oppose their victorious arms to Ethbaal's self-wise politics. By besieging, and at length taking and destroying, Tyre, they would tarnish and defile all his beauty and splendour: and they would bring him down to the grave, without any honour or ceremony; as those who are slain at sea, are thrown overboard to be devoured by the fishes. And would he still boast that he was a god, when in the hands of the executioners of the Lord's vengeance on him? Certainly his death would prove the contrary: and as he would die out of God's covenant and under his wrath, and the death of the wicked, (which was meant by the death of the uncircumcised,) he would perish miserably in every sense. 'Thou shalt come to the same ill end as befals the other enemies of God and of his truth.' (Lowth.) Hiram king of Tyre, was the friend of David and Solomon, and probably a pious person: yet his successors had joined the enemies of God, and Ithobalus especially would have his portion among them. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12—15. The prophet was directed to conclude the prediction against Tyre with a lamentation, or poetical elegy, over this haughty monarch; which would be the more remarkable, as he was at that time at the height of pride and prosperity. Ithobalus's opinion of his own dignity and his ostentation of magnificence, are described in very remarkable language. He vainly thought himself to be the sum of all excellency; that his abilities, personal accomplishments, authority, and splendour, comprised the fulness of wisdom and the perfection of beauty; and that they were his by an unalienable tenure, securely sealed up among his treasures. He thought his dignity as great, and his advantages as many, as those of Adam in Eden, in the garden of God. His crown was formed, and his garments decorated, with abundance of precious stones: of these nine are mentioned, which were set in gold, and were the same as nine of those that were placed in the breast-plate of the high-priest, whom some think he meant to vie with in this particular. Tabrets, and other musical instruments, had been prepared for him with exquisite skill; either to celebrate his coronation, the day when he was created king, or his birth, and afterwards his birth-day, as it annually returned. Perhaps he had been anointed king, according to the custom in Israel: it was his office to cover or protect his people, and for this purpose God had raised him to his throne: but he forgot his dependence on him, deemed himself able to do it by his own power, and shone in his own eyes, as an angel in heaven, or a deity. This refers to the cherubim that covered the mercy-seat, which were anointed with the holy ointment, along with the ark of the covenant, &c. (Marg. Ref.) or to those who guarded the entrance of Eden, and kept every way the tree of life. In this conceit of his own excellency, and counting himself equal to the inhabitants of heaven, the holy mountain of God, he walked up and down, surrounded and decorated with precious stones, sparkling like fire. Indeed the affairs of Tyre had been managed by him with great prudence and success, from the beginning of his reign; till the detection of his iniquity brought down the wrath of God upon him, and then he was infatuated to his ruin.—The expressions used in this poetical description of the excessive pride of this monarch, seem to allude to the fall of angels, and to that of Adam in Paradise; and they intimated that his ruin would be owing to the same cause, and attended with similar effects to him. (Notes, Is. xiv. 4—20.) He is likewise supposed to have been a type of the Roman antichrist, of whom similar things are spoken in the New Testament; and almost the whole of this description may be accommodated to that proud enemy of God and his truth. But indeed the character, pretensions, and fall of one man, who has been intoxicated with power and pride, so resembles those of others of the same spirit, that it is not always easy to determine, whether the coincidence arises from this circumstance, or whether the one was intended to be a type of the other.

Thou wast, &c. 'An exact description of the angelical perfection in which the devil was created; and in which he continued, till, being lifted up with pride, he fell from his estate.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.) chandise they have [n] filled the midst of thee with violence, and thou hast sinned: [o] therefore I will cast thee as profane out of the mountain of God; and I will destroy thee, [p] O covering cherub, from the midst of the stones of fire.

17 Thine [q] heart was lifted up because of thy beauty, [r] thou hast corrupted thy wisdom by reason of thy brightness: [s] I will cast thee to the ground, [t] I will lay thee before kings, that they may behold thee.

18 Thou hast [u] defiled thy sanctuaries by the multitude of thine iniquities, by the iniquity of thy traffic; [x] therefore will I bring forth a fire from the midst of thee, it shall devour thee; and [y] I will bring thee to ashes upon the earth in the sight of all them that behold thee.

V. 16—19. The policy of the king of Tyre had employed such methods of extending commerce, as led to much violence and oppression, and various transgressions of the divine law. And therefore, though he thought his city and throne sacred, as the mountain of God, being consecrated by his own divinity; yet the Lord would cast him out of it, as profane and abominable; he would destroy him from the midst of his ostentatious magnificence, as he had cast down the angels that sinned from their glorious state in heaven; and he should no longer think himself the protecting deity of Tyre. Seeing his heart was lifted up by his endowments and prosperity, and he had corrupted his wisdom, by employing it in base projects to increase his magnificence; the Lord would cast him to the ground, and render him a deplorable spectacle, and an instructive warning to other kings that should behold his fall. He had accounted his palaces to be sanctuaries, or temples to his own divinity, in which he sat as in the seat of God: but he had defiled them by his crimes, and the iniquity allowed in his traffic; therefore they would be consumed with a fire kindled by his own folly; and he should perish with them amidst many spectators, for a terror and a warning to them, and never be restored. (Notes, xxvii.) The infamous traffic of antichrist, in the Church of God and about holy things, will certainly expose him to similar or more terrible destruction.

V. 21—23. Tyre was built by the inhabitants of Zidon, which was the more ancient but the less considerable city, and depended on Tyre. The Lord however was against Zidon also; and he determined to glorify his power, justice, and truth, in executing judgments on her, by pestilence and the sword; that his holy name might thereby be known and had in honour. This seems to have been fulfilled by the Chaldeans. 'Zidon was afterwards utterly 'destroyed by Ochus, king of Persia.' (Lowth.)

V. 24—26. These cities bordering on Israel, and peopled in great measure from the ancient inhabitants of Canaan, had been thorns and briers to them; had created them much trouble, and treated them with great contempt. But they were about to be finally deprived of their power to molest them. So that when the Lord should restore Israel to their own land, for the glory of his name among the nations; they would dwell in peace and prosperity, being delivered from their enemies, by the just judgments of God upon them. This was in part fulfilled, after the return of the Jews from captivity: but it is probable, that it will have a more striking accomplishment, when they shall be converted to Christ, and gathered from their present dispersions. 'The last clause, (and many others 'to the same effect,) imply, that they shall know God and 'his perfections by their own experience.'

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

Pride is peculiarly the sin of our fallen nature, the essence of our apostacy, and the very poison which Satan's temptation infused into the hearts of our first parents, and through them into those of all their children. Every possession, endowment, or distinction, which the Lord confers upon us, serves to excite and give energy to this hateful propensity: and we are disposed to idolize the gifts, or to glory in them as if from ourselves; and to forget the Giver, to become his rivals, and to speak and act, as if we were independent of him and sufficient to our own safety and happiness. To such a tremendous excess has this disease sometimes arisen, that poor dying worms have fancied themselves deities; have demanded temples, sacrifices, and adoration; have dreamed, that they were able to save or to destroy; and have presumed to arrogate the style, and attempted to exercise the peculiar prerogatives, of the most High God! But the mightiest and the most accomplished monarch, whose heart is thus lifted up and intoxicated by dignity and prosperity, may be assured, that God will resist and abase him: and what a wretch will he be proved at last, who, having been honoured and flattered as more than human through life; dies in his sins, and has his eternal portion with the devil and his angels in the bottomless pit! Then, at least, the delusion will cease, and he will know himself to be a feeble and wretched, because a sinful, man. What then is that wisdom, of which so many boast, as if no secret could be hid from them? It may perhaps serve to amass riches and other incentives to their worldly lusts: yet even in this respect, both the exercise and the success of it depend on the providence of God. If in these things they were wiser and more prosperous than Daniel or than Solomon; yet the most illiterate and despised believer is far wiser than they, in the most important matters; for "the secret of the LORD is "with them that fear him," which can alone lead to happiness temporal and eternal. Whereas all the wisdom in the world, is in fact insufficient to save men's bodies from the grave, or their souls from hell: it cannot secure their limbs from pain, or their hearts from anguish: and a fever or a blow may render the wisest man on earth an idiot or a lunatic to the end of his days.

V. 11—26.

How vain are all talents, beauty, dignity, or magnificence! How little would it avail us if we could seal all worldly accomplishments and distinctions among our treasures! Nay, were it possible to enter the garden of Eden, and to contemplate its beauties, feast upon its fruits; or even to enter heaven, that holy mountain of God, and among his angels to behold the glories, and hear the harmony of that blessed place: we could enjoy no solid happiness, without a humble, holy, and spiritual mind. Should the brightest Cherub or Seraph there, who has been perfect since the day in which he was created, discover the least pride and iniquity, he must be cast out as profane, even as Satan the first offender was: so that all wisdom and prosperity, which elate the heart, or are corrupted in devising or compassing iniquity, will soon prove to be folly and misery: and all the brightness of earthly magnificence, and the vain joys of sensual ungodly mirth, will soon be exchanged for weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth; except "godly sorrow, which worketh repentance "unto salvation," intervene. Spiritual pride, however, is of all other most diabolical: and when men are puffed up with knowledge, gifts, or eminence in the Church of God; when they ambitiously usurp authority, and arrogate to themselves the power over men's consciences, or pretend to change the laws of God; when they mistake external pomp for the beauty of holiness, carnal policy for heavenly wisdom, and gain for godliness, and shine as angels in their own esteem: they peculiarly resemble Satan in heaven, when iniquity was first found in him; and are near a similar destruction to his, when he was cast down to hell. Such men often defile sacred places and functions by their iniquities and their infamous traffic about spiritual things: and they may expect to perish by no common destruction, but to be made a warning to others not to copy their sacrilege, blasphemy, and presumption. It is exceedingly difficult to possess any distinction, without being proud of it; or to conduct extensive and lucrative trade, without covetousness, oppression, or iniquity: indeed this can be learned no where, except in the school of Christ, and by the teaching of his Spirit. In short, sin alone can ruin a holy creature: and only he who taketh away sin, is able to do real good to fallen man. Happy therefore is the true Christian: though poor, afflicted, and despised; though destitute of shining talents, and exposed to pricking thorns and briers, or terrible persecutions. For whilst the cup of the Lord's indignation goes round, and he is glorified in executing judgments on his proud and prosperous enemies: he will display his truth, power, and mercy, in the salvation and everlasting honour and felicity of his redeemed people. Let others then celebrate the genius and learning of Greece, and the magnificence and riches of Tyre, Babylon, or Rome. Let us celebrate the praises of Zion, the city of our God, of which glorious things are spoken by the Lord himself: let us seek no other honours or distinctions than those which belong to all her citizens; and whatever else we remain ignorant of, let us seek the humbling sanctifying knowledge of God, and the enlarged experience of his salvation. Then we shall be enabled to say, "The lines are fallen unto me in a pleasant place: "yea, I have a goodly heritage."

IN the [a] tenth year, in the tenth month, in the twelfth day of the month, the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

2 Son of man, [b] set thy face against [c] Pharaoh king of Egypt, and prophesy against him, and [d] against all Egypt:

3 Speak, and say, Thus saith the Lord GOD; Behold, [e] I am against thee, Pharaoh king of Egypt, [f] the great dragon that lieth in the midst of his rivers, which hath said, [g] My river is mine own, and I have made it for myself.

4 But [h] I will put hooks in thy jaws, and I will cause [i] the fish of thy rivers to stick unto thy scales; and I will bring thee up out of the midst of thy rivers, and all the fish of thy rivers shall stick unto thy scales.

5 And [k] I will leave thee thrown into the wilderness, thee and all the fish of thy rivers: thou shalt fall upon the * open fields; thou shalt not be brought together, nor gathered: [l] I have given thee for meat to the beasts of the field, and to the fowls of the heaven.

6 And all the inhabitants of Egypt shall [m] know that I am the LORD, because they have been [n] a staff of reed to the house of Israel.

7 When [o] they took hold of thee by thy hand, [p] thou didst break, and rend all their shoulder: and when they leaned upon thee, thou brakest, and madest all their loins to be at a stand.

8 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD; Behold, [q] I will bring a sword upon thee, and [r] cut off man and beast out of thee.

9 And [s] the land of Egypt shall be desolate and waste; and they shall know that I am the LORD: [t] because he hath said, The river is mine, and I have made it.

10 Behold, therefore, I am against thee, and against thy rivers, and [u] I will make the land of Egypt † utterly waste and desolate, ‡ from the tower of ◊ Syene, even unto the border of Ethiopia.

11 No [x] foot of man shall pass through it, nor foot of beasts shall pass through it, neither shall it be inhabited [y] forty years.

12 And I will make the land of Egypt [z] desolate in the midst of the countries that are desolate, and her cities among the cities that are laid waste shall be desolate forty years: [a] and I will scatter the Egyptians among the nations, and will disperse them through the countries.

13 Yet thus saith the Lord GOD; [b] At the end of forty years will I gather the Egyptians from the people whither they were scattered:

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIX. V. 1. The tenth, &c. This and the three follwing chapters contain predictions concerning Egypt, delivered at different times; (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3—5. (Notes, Isaiah xviii. xix. xx. Jer. xliii. 8—13. xliv. 29, 30. xlvi.) Pharaoh-hophra, or Apries, king of Egypt was here represented by a great dragon, or crocodile, lying in the midst of his rivers. The river Nile, and the streams and canals which communicated with it, rendered Egypt peculiarly prosperous and wealthy: and that river abounds with crocodiles, which are very voracious, and domineer over the other inhabitants of the river, as if they were the sole proprietors, and placed there to devour all the rest. Such was Pharaoh-hophra: he was a man of a very haughty, tyrannical, and cruel disposition: and having prospered for several years, he grew exceedingly arrogant; and as Herodotus informs us, he boasted 'that 'no God could deprive him of his kingdom.' This impiety was as absurd as if the crocodile should think that the river was his own, and that he made it for himself. But the Lord was able to deal with this unruly monster, who lay fearless in his rivers, and set all the universe at defiance: he meant to destroy him and his forces, as if he had dragged the crocodile forth with a hook, and all the fish of the river had stuck to his scales, and they had been all cast together upon a dry and desert place, to be devoured by the wild beasts, and the birds of prey. Bochart observes, that the word Pharaoh signifies a crocodile, in Arabic. The Egyptians in process of time, wearied with the tyranny and cruelty of Hophra, revolted from him, and under Amasis they routed and destroyed his army, and all that adherred to him: at length he too fell into the conqueror's hands, and was strangled by him; and thus Amasis succeeded to the throne, after Egypt had suffered most dreadful miseries by these intestine dissentions.

V. 6, 7. These events, fulfilling this and other prophecies, would tend to convince the Egyptians that the God of the Jews was the Lord of the whole earth. They would be thus punished because they had seduced the Israelites into a dependence on them, and then deceived them to their ruin. Both Israel and Judah had very sinfully formed alliances with the Egyptians, and relying on them, had engaged in wars with the Assyrians and Chaldeans. But Egypt proved to them like a staff of reed, which will not bear the weight of those who lean on it; but breaking, pierces their hands or arms, and leaves them in pain to stagger or fall. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 8—13. The preceeding figurative prediction related principally to the king of Egypt; what follows chiefly respected the nation: that foretold the ruin of Hophra and 14 And I will bring again the captivity of Egypt, and will cause them to return into the land of [c] Pathros, into the land of their * habitation; and they shall be there a † base kingdom.

15 It shall be [d] the basest of the kingdoms; neither shall it exalt itself any more above the nations: for I will diminish them, that they shall no more [e] rule over the nations.

16 And it shall be no more [f] the confidence of the house of Israel, which [g] bringeth their iniquity to remembrance, when they shall look after them: [h] but they shall know that I am the Lord God.

17 ¶ And it came to pass in [i] the seven and twentieth year, in the first month, in the first day of the month, the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

18 Son of man, [k] Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon caused his army to serve a great service against Tyrus: every head was made bald, and every shoulder was peeled; yet had he no wages, nor his army, for Tyrus, for the service that he had served against it:

19 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD; Behold, [l] I will give the land of Egypt unto Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon; and he shall take her multitude, and ‡ take her spoil, and take her prey; and it shall be the wages for his army.

20 I have given him the land of Egypt for his § labour wherewith he [m] served against it, because they wrought for me, saith the Lord GOD.

his party by civil wars; this relates to the desolations occasioned by the victorious arms of Nebuchadnezzar, some years after. It is probable that the people had approved of the proud and imperious language of their king, and so were punished as accomplices in his crime. The Lord caused Nebuchadnezzar to invade Egypt; and gave him such success, that he put a stop to their commerce and intercourse with their neighbours, and to their agriculture and journeying, and even reduced the country to a desert, "from the tower of Siene," or rather from Migdol to Siene, "even "to the borders of Ethiopia;" from the entrance into Egypt out of Asia, to Ethiopia, from one end of the land to the other. History informs us that Nebuchadnezzar conquered Egypt, and carrying multitudes of prisoners thence, dispersed them in different parts of his dominions: and doubtless numbers perished or took shelter in other nations at the same time. But we are not sufficiently informed of the transactions of those ages, to show the exact fulfilment of this part of the prophecy, as it hath been done in other instances. It was, however, predicted that the land would continue desolate, and the inhabitants dispersed, till forty years were expired; the end of which term nearly coincided with the ruin of the Babylonish monarchy; and it is probable that Cyrus permitted the captive Egyptians to return, and re-people their own land, as well as the captive Jews. 'The calamities that befell 'the Egyptians are passed over by Herodotus; because the 'Egyptian priests would not inform him of any thing that 'tended to the disgrace of their nation.' (Scaliger.)

V. 14, 15. From a few years after the time that this prophecy was delivered, to the present day, Egypt has been governed by foreigners, and been tributary to other nations. It was long the most renowned kingdom in the world: but it had first oppressed, and then seduced and deceived the people of God; and this sentence was therefore denounced against it. After the ruin of the Babylonish monarchy, it was subdued by the Persians, and though it frequently revolted, they always recovered their dominion over it. It afterwards fell under the dominion of the Macedonians; then it became subject to the Romans, and at length a province of that empire. The Saracens next subdued it: then the Mamulucks, and lastly the Turks, to whom it remains in the most abject servitude at this day. Thus for above two thousand years Egypt hath continued a base and tributary kingdom, not able to exalt itself above the nations, as formerly; nor have the inhabitants, during all these ages, been permitted to live under princes of their own race. So that when at any time they have attempted to shake off the yoke; the short space during which they aimed at independence, was as nothing to this long term of years: and even then they were rather unsuccessfully struggling for liberty than actually enjoying it. This is a most astonishing accomplishment of a most singular prophecy: for who could have conceived, that so renowned and powerful a country should remain for such a succession of ages under subjection to foreigners? (Note, Gen. ix. 24, 25.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 16. The Egyptians being reduced into subjection, the Jews were never afterwards tempted to place any confidence in them, as they had before done. Their confidence in Egypt brought their iniquity to remembrance: either it provoked the Lord to call their sins to remembrance, that he might punish them: or when the Jews in after ages should look upon the abject state of Egypt, it would cause them to remember, and be ashamed of the sin committed by their ancestors in depending on that people.

V. 17—20. Nebuchadnezzar besieged Tyre thirteen years before he took it. During the siege his soldiers had endured great hardship; their heads had been made bald by constantly wearing their helmets, and their shoulders had been peeled by carrying materials to form the works; and the king must have been at incalculable expense in the undertaking: yet when the Tyrians found that their city must fall, they sent away their most valuable effects, either to the city on the island, or to their colonies; or else they destroyed them: so that the plunder of the city was not sufficient to defray the charges of the siege, or to recompense the labours of the army. But the Lord considered Nebuchadnezzar and the Chaldeans as his servants, to execute his predicted vengeance on the Tyrians; and he purposed to give them a suitable recompense. He would therefore employ them in the conquest of Egypt, which being weakened by civil wars, would be an easy prey, and abundantly enrich them with its spoil. This prophecy was a confirmation of the preceding, which had been delivered almost seventeen years before.

V. 21. This seems to refer to the increasing influence and authority of Daniel, in the court of Nebuchadnezzar; and the more favourable disposition of that prince to the religion of the Jews, during the latter part of his life. It may also relate to the deliverance of Jeconiah from prison, and the favour shown him by Evil-merodach, the son of Nebuchadnezzar; which was a token for good to the house of Israel, in that the family of David began again in some measure to prosper. But some think that that day, relates to the termination of the forty years of Egypt's desolations, when the captivity of the Jews would also cease. We may suppose, that Ezekiel continued prophesying, when Daniel was in authority, and after Jeconiah's enlargement, with greater encouragement and effect than before: but this, as connected with the former part of the next chapter, seems to be the latest prophecy of his that is transmitted to us. "When thy prophecies are made good by the event, this shall add a new authority to what thou speakest." (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Wherever we turn our attention, we discover evidences of the pride and folly of the human heart; and of the abhorrence with which God beholds those who forget their dependence on him, and rob him of the glory due to his name. Prosperous oppressors are amongst the human species, as crocodiles in a river, or sea-monsters in the great waters: and whilst they prey without remorse on their inferiors, they should be regarded as the common enemies of mankind. Yet they have commonly bewitched the greatest part of those whom they have enslaved into a stupid admiration of their power and success, and into a pertinacious adherence to them even to their own ruin!—When princes and their subjects unite in impiety and iniquity, the Lord often renders them reciprocally the occasions, or instruments, of each other's punishment. For he is against, and will show himself above, the most powerful and insolent workers of iniquity; and can easily subdue those who set all others, and even him, at defiance. He fights against those who injure his people, and still more against such as seduce them from their confidence in him, and draw them into sin. And though they deserve to be deceived, wounded, and deserted by those in whom they have sinfully confided: yet their tempters and deceivers must expect the severest punishment. The desolating judgments and the avenging sword, which the Lord hath sent forth into all parts of the earth, and the inconceivable miseries and havock that war hath made in every age and nation, prove that the world is full of wickedness: and these lamentable scenes not only illustrate the justice of God; but they are the natural effect of man's pride, revenge, ambition, avarice, and callous selfishness: they prove him to be the child, and to bear the image, of the arch-apostate, "the murderer from the beginning;" and to possess the same nature with the first-born of fallen Adam, who murdered his righteous brother. But it is a relief to the pious and humane mind to discern traces of the superintending providence of God, and of the truth of his word, in reviewing these dark transactions. The history of nations, in their rise, progress, and decline, is the best exposition of ancient prophecies: all events, in one way or other, fulfil the Scriptures, and turn to the believer for a testimony; for he remembers, that "thus it was written and thus it must be." All things work together for the good of the Church; even nations are reduced, to remove from the people of God the occasions of sin, and to promote their holiness: and in the midst of the most tremendous scenes of war and bloodshed, he is bringing forward those glorious times of truth, and righteousness, and peace, which he hath promised shall succeed these convulsions. Thus in the deepest scenes of our adversity he sows the seed of our future prosperity. The Lord hath raised up for us a Horn of salvation in the house of his servant David: and he will shortly raise up ministers, and open their mouths, to proclaim his Gospel throughout the earth. Like a rich and generous master, he will not let any man serve him for nothing; if he employ ambitious or covetous men as his executioners, he will recompense them according to the leading desires of their hearts: and verily every man shall have his reward. Happy then are they, who desire his favour, grace and image, and relish the spiritual blessings of his new covenant: they will delight in his service, and not covet any recompense, except his merciful acceptance; while the riches, honours, and pleasures which they have chosen, shall be ensured to them for ever and ever.

did not invade that country till he had taken Tyre; it is probable, that this prophecy was delivered about the same time with that in the close of the former chapter, and several years after those which follow. The Egyptians were called upon to howl with anguish in the prospect of these judgments; as they surely would do when they arrived: and to cry "Wo worth the day," or alas the day; intimating that it would be the most dreadful day which they had ever seen. For it would be the day in which God would execute vengeance on his enemies; and so a cloudy day, or one of uncommon terror and distress, especially as clouds and rain were rarely known in Egypt. It would also be the time of the heathen; the time of divine judgments on the Gentiles, as there had been a time of his wrath and judgments on the Jews. God's judgments 'on particular places and nations are an earnest of that 'general judgment, when he shall execute judgment on all 'the ungodly.' (Lowth.)

V. 4, 5. As Ethiopia bordered on Egypt, and was in alliance with the Egyptians, it would share in these extreme calamities: and their forces would be slain among those of Egypt. For the foundations of her cities, or those of her government, would be broken down; and all her allies and mercenary troops from different nations, would fall by the sword.—'The names in the Hebrew are 'Cush, Phut, and Lud.' (Marg. Ref.) 'Phut may sig-'nify some part of Africa near Egypt, and Lud probably 'signifies some part of the Abyssine's country.' The 'Cubii are mentioned in Ptolemy, as the people of Mare-'otis, a province of Egypt. The seventy translate it, (the 'last clause,) 'the men of my league, or covenant; i. e. the 'Jews; many of whom fleeing into Egypt, were there de-'stroyed with the Egyptians.' (Lowth.)

V. 7. Her cities, &c. Egypt was exceedingly populous and more filled with cities than any other nation in the world at that time; which would render her desolation the more extraordinary.

V. 9. The providence of God would take care, that messengers should be sent in ships by sea, or boats up the Nile, to inform the Ethiopians of the ruin of Egypt, and to alarm them with fears of similar calamities; from which they carelessly deemed themselves secure. Perhaps Nebuchadnezzar sent these messengers to summon the Ethiopians to surrender. They would however occasion them great distress and terror, similar to the astonishment of the nations, in the day when the Egyptians were destroyed at the Red Sea; (Ex. xv. 15, 16.) or to what the Egyptians had just before endured.

V. 10, 11. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12. If the rivers of Egypt had been dried up, that fruitful land must have become a barren desert; and the Lord was about as effectually to destroy all the sources of its power and prosperity: for he would as entirely deliver up the land into the possession of wicked and oppressing spoilers, as if he had sold it to them. Such were the Chaldeans, who first conquered, plundered, and enslaved Egypt; and the Persians, Macedonians, Romans, Saracens, Mamulucks, and Turks, who have successively domineered over and oppressed that country, equally deserved this character. These strangers have wasted, and cruelly tyrannized over Egypt from that time to this present day; according to the word of God by Ezekiel.

the ancients for wisdom and learning, wealth, power, and prosperity; than for the multitude of their idols, and the stupidity with which they worshipped even various reptiles and vegetables. On these idols they depended for protection: but the Lord determined to destroy them with their worshippers, and the cities in which they were stationed. (Marg. Ref.) This hath been remarkably fulfilled; for the ancient idolatry of Egypt gradually declined, or was exchanged for that of other nations, when the country fell under the dominion of foreign lords: and as there hath not been for above two thousand years a prince of the land of Egypt: (Note, xxix. 15.) so the Egyptians have long received their religion from their masters, and have been an abject servile race, greatly afraid of offending their cruel oppressors. The present Egyptians are either Mahometans; or an ignorant superstitious kind of Christians, who seem to have little more than the name of that holy religion. V. 20—26. This prophecy was delivered soon after the Egyptians had come to relieve Jerusalem, when besieged by Nebûchadnezzar; but had gone back unto their own land without effecting any thing; and some months before that city was taken: that is, more than sixteen years before the preceding prophecies. The Lord then informed his servant, that he had broken the arm of Pharaoh, and that it never should be set or bound up, to be healed and made strong to hold a sword any more. When the king of Babylon took from the king of Egypt all his dominions in Asia, one of his arms was broken. This had taken place some time before in the time of Pharaoh-necho: and the Lord declared, that he should never recover those territories, or any ascendency in that part of the world; nay, that his other arm, which was now strong, should soon be broken; so that the sword would drop out of that likewise. This took place under his son and successor, when Egypt was so weakened by civil wars, as to be utterly unable to resist the invaders: and when Pharaoh-hophra was vanquished, dethroned, and driven into the fens to hide himself from Amasis and his party. These events made way for Nebuchadnezzar's conquest of that kingdom. All this time he was acquiring strength and enlarging his dominions: for the Lord strengthened his arms, and put the sword of his vengeance into his hand. Thus the Egyptians were vanquished, enslaved, dispersed, and carried captive. In the mean time Hophra, equally obnoxious to both the contending parties, dragged on his life in great terror and misery: and at length, after a fruitless effort to recover his authority, he was taken and strangled by Amasis, who succeeded, as the vassal of Nebuchadnezzar, to the throne of this desolated and ruined country.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

That power which renders men proud must come down; and that prosperity and peace, which lead to carelessness and carnal security, will terminate in terror and anguish.—The wrath of God consumes the prosperity and wealth of powerful nations, when the day of his vengeance comes; it desolates populous countries, or covers them with the carcasses of the slain: it turns a fruitful land into a barren desert, and flourishing cities into ruinous heaps: it fills all places with terror and misery, and reduces men to the most abject servitude: yet these are only present effects of the divine indignation, and not worthy of our fear, compared with the wrath to come, from which Jesus delivers his people. It is vain to endeavour to bind up the arm which the Lord is pleased to break, or to strengthen those whom he will bring down: a dark and cloudy day awaits his enemies, and all, who associate with them, or help them, will share their punishment. All power and success is from the Lord; and men prosper so long, as they are employed in executing his righteous purposes. Happy are his willing servants, who so know him "in Christ recon-"ciling the world unto himself," as to fear, love, trust, worship, and obey him. In one way or other, however, all shall know the Lord: and they who disregard the discoveries which he hath made of himself in mercy, will at length know his power, truth, and justice, in the punishment inflicted on them for their sins: whilst they will be for ever excluded from all hope of his favour; and groan and wail, because their wound is incurable. All earthly prosperity is fluctuating: they who to-day are at the top of the wheel, before to-morrow may be turned to the bottom, and their arrogant presumption changed into abject despair. But the everlasting mercy of our unchangeable God secures the final felicity of all that love his name.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXI. V. 2. Pharaoh, &c. The prophet could not personally address Pharaoh, or his numerous attendants, forces, or subjects: but his prophecies would doubtless be made known in Chaldea, and by degrees in other countries; and they might come to the ears of the Egyptian king. This prophecy was delivered about a month before Jerusalem was taken. Pharaoh was very proud of his power and greatness: and the prophet inquired to whom he supposed himself to be like? Doubtless he thought himself, and was celebrated by his flatterers, as equal to the greatest monarchs that had ever lived: but even if this had been true, it would not have secured the continuance of his prosperity; for the event had shown, that the most renowned and successful kings and kingdoms might soon be brought to destruction.

10 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD; Because thou hast lifted up thyself in height, and he hath shot up his top among the thick boughs, [q] and his heart is lifted up in his height;

11 I have therefore [r] delivered him into the hand of [s] the mighty one of the heathen; * he shall surely deal with him: [t] I have driven him out for his wickedness.

12 And [u] strangers, the terrible of the nations, have cut him off, and have left him: [x] upon the mountains and in all the valleys his branches are fallen, and his boughs are broken by all the rivers of the land; and all the people of the earth are [y] gone down from his shadow, and have left him.

13 Upon [z] his ruin shall all the fowls of the heaven remain, and all the beasts of the field shall be upon his branches:

14 To [a] the end that none of all the trees by the waters exalt themselves for their height, neither shoot up their top among the thick boughs, neither their trees † stand up in their height, all that drink water: for they are all [b] delivered unto death, to [c] the nether parts of the earth, in the midst of the children of men, with them that go down to the pit.

15 Thus saith the Lord GOD; in the day when he went down to the grave [d] I caused a mourning; I covered the deep for him, and I restrained the floods thereof, and the great waters were stayed: and I caused Lebanon to ‡ mourn for him, and all the trees of the field fainted for him.

V. 3—9. The Assyrian monarchy was one of the most ancient and prosperous, that we read of in history. It seems to have attained its summit of greatness under Shalmaneser and Sennacherib. But it is not certainly known when and by whom it was destroyed. Probably it was reduced about the time that Nebuchadnezzar began his reign at Babylon, by him and Cyaxares king of Media. Nineveh, the capital of that monarchy, which was one of the most extensive cities ever built, was then taken, and from that time began to decay, until it was at length so entirely desolated, that modern travellers are not agreed where it was situated. These events will be more particularly considered upon several passages in the prophecies of Jonah, Nahum, and Zephaniah. But here the prophet mentioned the fall of the Assyrian monarchy, as a fact which was well known to have lately taken place. The Assyrian king had been highly exalted in his kingdom: and his great power, and extensive dominions, with the protection he afforded to his friends, resembled the spreading branches, the thick shade, and the high stature of a very flourishing cedar on mount Lebanon. The fruitful lands of Assyria; the large revenues which the king drew from vast multitudes all over his extensive territories; his extensive commerce, through the river Tygris, with the countries bordering on the Indian ocean; or in a word, the various sources of his wealth and prosperity, resembled the rivers and streams, which cause the trees planted by them to grow exceedingly. By these means this empire and its head were exalted above all the kingdoms of the earth; their power became more formidable, and their vassals more numerous than those of any other people: so that cities, provinces, and nations, courted their alliance; took shelter under their powerful protection; and increased and prospered under it, as the fowls of the air amidst the boughs, and the beasts of the field under the covert, of the wide spreading lofty cedar. Thus the monarch became renowned and honourable: and this cedar in Lebanon grew more lofty, than any cedar in the garden of God, or in Eden; or any of the kingdoms or independent states, which might be compared to fir-trees, and chesnut-trees, or any other stately and beautiful trees. Perhaps the ascendency acquired by the Assyrian monarchs over the kings of Judah likewise, may be alluded to by the expression, that "no tree in the garden of God was like "unto him in his beauty." However, they were so prospered in the providence of God, that all other kings and princes envied them their great success and renown. (Notes, xvii.)

V. 10—13. The allegory and its interpretation are here interwoven. The Assyrian monarch though already destroyed, was poetically addressed; and probably the whole race of those princes who reigned in succession was intended, as the description so exactly suits the character of Sennacherib; (Notes, Is. x. xxxvi. xxxvii.) They were ambitious of reducing all other kings and nations to subjection, and of establishing an universal monarchy; and their pride increased in proportion to their power and success. The Lord had therefore delivered the last of that line into the hand of the mighty one of the heathen, or the conqueror of the nations, who was able to deal with him; even Nebuchadnezzar, the subverter of the Assyrian monarchy. By him the Lord had driven the king of Assyria from his throne, his palace, his royal city, and his kingdom, for his wickedness. The Chaldeans, a people to whom the nations had hitherto been strangers, (as they were but lately risen into eminence,) but who were most terrible for valour and fierceness, cut down this lofty cedar, and left him to wither and decay. So large was it grown, that its fallen branches covered the mountains and valleys, and its broken boughs were found near all the rivers: that is, the fragments of this vast dismembered empire formed many states and kingdoms. And when the nations found that the Assyrian king could no longer protect them, they renounced their allegiance to him: nay, the very persons, who had courted his friendship, now preyed upon him and insulted over him! Or literally, the birds and beasts of prey came to devour the carcasses of the multitudes, who were slain in these conflicts.

16 I [e] made the nations to shake at the sound of his fall, [f] when I cast him down to hell with them that descend into the pit: [g] and all the trees of Eden, the choice and best of Lebanon, all that drink water, shall be comforted [h] in the nether parts of the earth.

17 They also [i] went down into hell with him unto them that be slain with the sword; and they [k] that were his arm, that [l] dwelt under his shadow in the midst of the heathen.

18 To whom [m] art thou thus like in glory and in greatness among the trees of Eden? yet shalt thou be brought down [n] with the trees of Eden unto the nether parts of the earth: [o] thou shalt lie in the midst of the uncircumcised, with them that be slain by the sword. [p] This is Pharaoh and all his multitude, saith the Lord GOD.

V. 14—17. The Lord destroyed the Assyrian monarchy, for a warning to all other kings and nations, not to be ambitious of dominion, or proud of pre-eminence, or secure in prosperity; and not to depend on themselves, or forget God as the Author of their advantages; for the rivers, whence they drank waters, came originally from that Ocean. All the monarchs of Assyria, or the last king and all his proud princes; and all those in every age, who had domineered over their neighbours, and despised God, had been delivered to death, and their bodies were gone under the earth, amidst the rest of the children of men, even like the meanest of them, who without funeral pomp are thrown into the pit: and this was the end of their greatness, to which many of them had been hurried by a violent and premature death. Indeed when the Assyrian monarch went down to the grave, the Lord so ordered it, that there was a great mourning for him. 'The deep, 'that nursed up this fair tree, is described as mourning at 'its downfal; as if the floods had stopped their usual 'course, on purpose to lament his fate. The forest of 'Lebanon, sympathized with his misfortunes; that is, all 'his confederates and allies.' (Lowth.) His fall affected many nations and provinces, and vast multitudes of people, who had lived under his government and contributed to his greatness. A stop was put by his death to their enriching commerce, and to all the business connected with the government of so vast an empire: and all who grew rich by collecting the revenue, or by honourable and lucrative offices, would doubtless lament his fall. This seems to be meant by the Lord's covering the deep, and restraining the floods, as in mourning for him: which denote a stagnation of that profitable circulation, which there must be in a prosperous empire, betwixt all parts of it and the seat of government. Especially the Assyrian nobles and people, the Lebanon where this cedar grew, doubtless deplored the loss of that empire which they had so long possessed, and fainted for grief and for apprehensions of the fatal effects that might follow this catastrophe. The surrounding nations also shook at the sound, or report of this revolution, (as the fall of a mighty cedar may be heard at a great distance.) Yet when the Lord cast him into the grave and the invisible world, they who had formerly envied or rivalled him, and who had grown prosperous by similar resources, till he had reduced and ruined them, would be comforted and rejoice to see him ruined in like manner. This is represented under the bold figure of those that lay in the grave, or in the state of the dead, congratulating each other, when they saw their destroyer coming to join them in that abject situation! (Is. xiv. 9—12.) And they also, who confided in his protection, and were his support, (his soldiers, captains, and confederates,) had been slain with him, and were with him gone down into the grave and the world of departed spirits.

V. 18. Pharaoh is here called to look in this glass, and to see what his glory and greatness would speedily come to. Even if he were as honourable and powerful as the Assyrian king: he would soon be slain, and die a miserable death, and perish among those who were strangers and enemies to God. This sentence was irrevocably passed on Pharaoh and all his multitude.

This is, &c. 'The word is, commonly denotes the same 'as to signify, or represent, especially in prophecies, para-'bles, and such like figurative descriptions.' (Lowth.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

What competition and striving is there among men about the precarious, unsatisfactory, and perishing distinctions of this world! But how few are candidates for that "crown of glory which fadeth not away!" Many of the most powerful, prosperous, and renowned, have also been the most abominable of mankind: and whilst millions have been subjected to their will, perhaps they had not one subject more vile in the sight of God than themselves. This consideration may serve to abate our admiration of those gaudy distinctions, which the Lord evidently deems so worthless and perilous; and may teach us to seek more valuable and enduring advantages. All greatness and success come from God, through whatever channels they are conveyed: but how few properly consider their dependence on him and obligations to him! Generally prosperity increases pride, presumption, and impiety, in regular proportion. They who have the most of those things which are supposed to constitute an earthly paradise, are either envied themselves, or envy others, or both; and this greatly interrupts the little enjoyment which otherwise they might find in them: but the blessings of the heavenly paradise are not liable to such alloy. How much better then is it to be a lowly tree of righteousness, yielding fruit to the glory of God and the good of men, and in the end to be transplanted into the garden of God above, to flourish for ever, than to be a lofty cedar, and at length to be cut down and cast into the fire of hell!

their subjects: and this entitles them to allegiance, submission, and tribute from them. We should be thankful for the blessings of civil government, and not envy those who bear the burden of governing; and who, if they abuse their trust, will have a still heavier burden of punishment laid upon them in another world. The Lord never drives men from their possessions, or bereaves them of their comforts, but when he can show that their sins deserved it. He has executioners ready, when vengeance is to be taken: but we need not desire to be the mighty, or the terrible, of the nations, to be thus employed; seeing it is far more pleasant and profitable to follow Him, who "went "about doing good." They who trust in princes, will soon be driven from their confidences or perish with them: and they who selfishly favour the prosperous, will as selfishly desert or prey upon them, when they are fallen. The higher men soar in power and pride, the more terrible will be their fall: and such conspicuous characters commonly involve multitudes of friends and dependents in their ruin, and are sincerely lamented by those who are losers by their calamities. Yet some will rejoice to see them reduced to as abject a condition as themselves: but the gratification of envy, revenge, and malignity, is a wretched comfort, suited only to the inhabitants of hell. In the fate of proud, ungodly oppressors of former ages, they, who tread in their steps, may read their own doom: and the Lord executes such extraordinary judgments on purpose to warn others from their destructive courses. It is the end of wicked men of every age, nation, and condition in life, to go down into the grave, to die with the uncircumcised, and to have their portion in the unquenchable fire of hell: and they who delight in war, commonly perish by the sword. The wicked man is indeed often seen flourishing like the cedar, and spreading like the green bay tree: but the pious observer will notice, that he soon passes away, and is not; and when he seeks him, his place can no where be found. But let us "mark the perfect man, and behold the upright; for the end of that man is peace."

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXII. V. 1. This was about a year and a half after the destruction of Jerusalem; and at a time when Pharaoh continued in the undisturbed possession of his power and prosperity. It is remarkable, that there should be so many predictions concerning the ruin of this monarch, and the desolations of his kingdom. But Egypt had been the first oppressor of the Church, and was to be judged for it; and perhaps that kingdom typified antichrist, and the more dreadful ruin that awaits him: (Gen. xv. 13, 14. Rev. xi. 8.)

V. 2—6. The Egyptian king had resembled a young and fierce lion, in his conduct both towards his subjects and his neighbours: or, in allusion to the seas and rivers, with which his kingdom was bounded and intersected, he was a sea-monster, or a crocodile. (Marg. Ref.) In the height of his prosperity he raised a vast army, and made war upon the Cyrenians: but he was vanquished, and his army cut in pieces; and the Egyptians, suspecting from his savage temper, that he had led them forth on purpose to be thus destroyed, made an insurrection against him; which he increased by further cruelties and rash measures, until it made way for his ruin. Thus the voracious crocodile went forth with, or from, his rivers, to trouble and foul those of his neighbours: but the Lord spread his net upon him, and used a company of many people to drag him out of his rivers; and he was then cast forth upon the open field, to be devoured by the birds and beasts of prey. To represent Pharaoh's great power, and the effects of his fall, it was figuratively stated, that the flesh of this overgrown monster was so vast, that it would cover the mountains and fill the valleys; and that his blood would be sufficient to drench the land even to the mountains, and to fill the rivers; as when the waters were turned into blood in the days of Moses. This denotes, that his ruin would be atended with terrible miseries to the Egyptians, and afford an immense booty to their enemies.

V. 7, 8. Pharaoh thought himself the great luminary of Egypt: but the Lord declared, that he would put him out by dethroning him. Then the whole land would be darkened, as if the sun, moon, planets, and stars were all eclipsed and hidden at once; and the darkness would be as entire, as in the plague that was inflicted in the time of Moses. These bold metaphors denote the total subversion of the state; the anarchy and civil wars which ensued; the miseries attending the Chaldean invasion; and the contempt, baseness, and abject slavery, to which that once flourishing kingdom was about to be reduced. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9, 10. When the report of the ruin of Egypt should reach many distant nations, and the fugitives, or exiles, should relate the particulars to those among whom they were dispersed, it would greatly disquiet their hearts; even though they had not been any ways connected with that kingdom: for it would be a most affecting instance of the instability of human affairs, and of God's wrath against the enemies of his people. They would thus see, as it were, the Lord brandishing his sword before their eyes, which would fill them with amazement and terror; and every one of them would tremble continually, lest the next stroke should destroy them in like manner.

V. 11—14. The desolations of Egypt were effected by the king of Babylon; and this was the sword which was hung over the head of Pharaoh, though his fall was immediately wrought by his own subjects. The Chaldeans, by invading Egypt, were about to destroy the multitudes of its inhabitants, and to terminate its splendour and dignity: nay, they would so desolate the land, that the waters of it should no more be frequented, as before, with the foot of man or beast: and the Lord would cause their waters to be deep, and their rivers to run smooth and silent, like oil; as there would be none to drain them off into canals, or by any means to impede their course, or to disturb them. Some understand this last verse of the adjacent countries.—'When Egypt is made desolate, then their neighbours 'will enjoy such quietness as a river doth, which smoothly 'glides along, and never has its stream fouled or dis-'turbed.' (Lowth.)

V. 15, 16. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 17. Fifteenth, &c. That is, of the twelfth month, just a fortnight after the preceding prophecy. Perhaps these predictions were delivered on the sabbath-days, to the assembled captive Jews.

and enemies to God. Or the nation may be meant, the total ruin of which was described by the death and burial of an individual.

V. 20. Draw, &c. Let the Chaldeans drag Egypt, and her multitudes, like criminals to execution, or drag their corpses out to be buried disgracefully in a pit.

V. 21. Pharaoh is here poetically represented as entering the state of the dead, whither many mighty warriors and potentates had gone before him; and he is addressed, and welcomed by them to their dreary habitation. The bold imagery of eastern poetry abounds in these descriptions: yet they imply the general belief that when the body is cast into the grave, the soul enters an invisible state, where it retains its consciousness and capacities.—'Here follows a poetical description of the infernal regions, where the ghosts of deceased tyrants, with their subjects, are represented as coming to meet the king of Egypt and his auxiliaries. Hell, signifies here the state of the dead.' (Lowth.)

V. 22, 23. The king of Assyria was ready to meet Pharaoh, when he should be made "free among the dead." He is represented as surrounded by the graves of multitudes, that had been slain along with him. These were set in the sides of that pit, into which the Assyrian had fallen before it came to Pharaoh's turn. The subversion of the monarchy and the destruction of the people, as well as the death of the king, was intended by this representation. They had caused terror in the land of the living, but being slain and buried, they lay quiet in the pit, and none feared them. The Jewish expositors understand the land of Israel, by the land of the living, because the way of life and salvation was there known.

V. 24, 25. Nebuchadnezzar is supposed to have conquered the province of Elam, which formed a part of Persia. It is therefore represented as fallen with the multitude of its inhabitants into the grave, having been slain by the sword. They too had been renowned and terrible; but at length they bore the shame of being defeated and destroyed. A bed, or coffin, was placed for Elam, (the nation being represented as a deceased woman,) in the midst of all her multitude: and their king also was placed among those that were slain.

V. 26—28. Meshech and Tubal seem to mean the Scythians and northern nations, who frequently made inroads into the southern and more fertile countries of Asia, and caused great terror and devastation; but generally perished with as dreadful a slaughter. They too had caused terror in the land of the living; yet they would not lie with the mighty, or be numbered with the Assyrian or Egyptian monarchies. But they went down to death, with their weapons of war in their hands, as men who fought desperately and scorned to yield; and they were buried with their swords laid under their heads, as denoting their characters and exploits; whilst their iniquities or depredations had brought their bones to the grave, and perhaps afterwards exposed them to insults from those whom they had injured. Among such persons would Pharaoh be broken, and slain, and perish. Some give another sense to the passage. 'They shall not lie among those 'heroes who died a natural death, and are laid in the grave 'with pomp and magnificence: who were carried to their 'graves in state; and had their achievements and other 'ensigns of honour affixed to their monuments for perpetuating their memory.' V. 30. The north. This may mean the Medes, Armenians, or other nations north of Babylon; or rather, the Tyrians and Syrians north of Judah, who were more likely to be mentioned with the Zidonians.

V. 31, 32. When Pharaoh should enter the state of the dead, and see all these kings and nations who had gone before him, he would the more willingly submit to his doom. This is spoken according to the common sentiments of mankind, who are better satisfied to suffer with a multitude than alone: though it can be no comfort to those who have perished in their sins, to find multitudes as miserable as themselves. In short, they had caused their terror in the land of the living; and the Lord was about to cause his terror to fall upon them.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16.

How weak and helpless, in respect of the Almighty, are the most powerful and terrible of mankind! Whilst they ravage on every side, devour their own species, and trouble the nations of the earth, to gratify their mad ambition or revenge, he spreads his net over them, entangles them, and disposes of them at his pleasure; and their former greatness only renders them a richer prey, or a more tremendous spectacle, to those around them! Thus "the lamp of the wicked is put out;" the pomp and splendour of kings and kingdoms are totally extinguished; their sun goes down at noon; and their boasted luminaries set to rise no more! Terror and amazement must needs seize the hearts of those against whom the Lord brandishes his sword; and they must tremble every moment for their lives and souls. It is very mortifying to the pride of man, to consider what numbers, that once "caused "terror in the land of the living," are now gone down to the grave. They who made the earth to tremble, and whose renown and power extended to the most distant regions, are now confined within the narrow limits of the tomb. They whose counsels and eloquence swayed the determinations of princes and nations, and had as extensive effects on human affairs as the sword of the mighty, now lie silent in the dust! They whose wisdom, learning, beauty, wit, or politeness, were celebrated by numerous admirers, are now decayed and mingled with their original earth! Whilst the unnoticed multitudes, who go down obscurely to the grave, by thousands every hour, are vast beyond conception. All this is the punishment of sin, and the execution of the sentence, "Dust thou art, and unto "dust shalt thou return."

V. 17—32.

It is inconceivable how great a proportion of the human race have been prematurely hurried into the grave, by the diabolical trade of war. As if men did not die fast enough of themselves! or as if destruction were the most honourable and pleasing employment that the strong among the mighty of the earth could devise for themselves and their numerous retainers! The subject is in every view gloomy and horrid: but if we recollect, that when the body goes down to the dust, the soul enters into an unchangeable state of happiness or misery; that all who die uncircumcised in heart, unconverted and unbelieving, go down into the midst of hell, to bear for ever their shame and punishment; and that vast multitudes die in the very heat of their most malignant and diabolical passions, or in the midst of forbidden gratifications, with their unrepented iniquities upon their souls, and unmortified lusts domineering in their hearts; many of them also answerable for the crimes and destruction of their fellow sinners; the view becomes tremendous in the extreme. Alas, what are men about? How are they blinded and deceived by Satan! What are those objects, which they thus pursue, through scenes of horror and seas of blood, and multiplied impieties and iniquities? Surely man walketh in a vain shadow, and disquieteth himself in vain; whether he pursue riches, renown, power, or pleasure! Soon must he be torn from all his possessions and gratifications, to join the multitude of the dead; and to "receive the things done in the body, "whether they be good or evil:" and it will be a wretched consolation to those who perish in their sins, that vast multitudes have gone, and are going, the same broad road to destruction: since as they were mutual tempters here, so they will be mutual tormentors hereafter; (Luke xvi. 27, 28.) As "the hour cometh when all that are in the "graves shall hear the voice of Christ, and shall come "forth, they that have done good to the resurrection of "life, and they that have done evil to the resurrection of "damnation;" we, that have known something of the terror of the Lord, would fain persuade men to hearken to the voice of the great and terrible Judge, now that he speaks to them as a compassionate and merciful Saviour; and to seek first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness. Then being pardoned, justified, and sanctified, in the name

CHAP. XXXIII.

The prophet is instructed in the duties of his office, as the watchman of Israel, 1—9; commanded to state the rule by which God dealt with them, and the equity of his conduct, 10—20; informed of the destruction of Jerusalem; and ordered to reprove the vain hopes and crimes of those who remained in the land, 21—29; and shown the hypocrisy and covetousness of those who came to hear the word of God from him, 30—33.

AGAIN the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

2 Son of man, [a] speak to the children of thy people, and say unto them, * When [b] I bring the sword upon a land, if the people of the land take a man of their coasts, and [c] set him for their watchman:

3 If when he seeth the sword come upon the land, [d] he blow the trumpet, and warn the people;

4 Then † whosoever [e] heareth the sound of the trumpet, and taketh not warning; if the sword come, and take him away, [f] his blood shall be upon his own head.

5 He heard the sound of the trumpet, and took not warning; his blood shall be upon him. [g] But he that taketh warning shall deliver his soul.

6 But if the watchman see the sword come, [h] and blow not the trumpet, and the people be not warned; if the sword come, and take any person from among them, [i] he is taken away in his iniquity; but [j] his blood will I require at the watchman's hand.

7 So thou, O son of man, [k] I have set thee a watchman unto the house of Israel; therefore [l] thou shalt hear the word at my mouth, and warn them from me.

8 When I say unto the wicked, [m] O wicked man, thou shalt surely die; [n] if thou dost not speak to warn the wicked from his way, [o] that wicked man shall die in his iniquity; but his blood will I require at thine hand.

9 Nevertheless, [p] if thou warn the wicked of his way to turn from it; [q] if he do not turn from his way, he shall die in his iniquity; but [r] thou hast delivered thy soul.

10 ¶ Therefore, O thou son of man, speak unto the house of Israel; Thus ye speak, saying, [s] If our transgressions and our sins be upon us, and we pine away in them, [t] how should we then live?

of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God, they need not fear death or the grave: for Jesus hath engaged to receive the departing spirits of his people to his glorious presence: their bodies will feel no pain in the silent tomb: and he will at length raise them up also, incorruptible and glorious, that they may be for ever with him. Let us then comfort one another in this dying world with these words; and let us "be steadfast, unmoveable, always "abounding in the work of the Lord, as knowing that "our labour will not be in vain in the Lord."

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXIII. V. 2—9. (Notes, &c. iii. 17—19.) The prophet had before been thus shown the important responsibility of his prophetical office: but after the most awful part of his predictions was accomplished, he was again reminded of it, and ordered to declare it to the people; that they might be taught to approve his faithfulness, and that he might be warned to persevere in it. They were called "the children of his people," as if God would disown them because of their wickedness. The instruction is the same as before; but the illustrations are more full and explicit. The Lord himself had sent the sword upon the land: and the recent transactions in Judah, where such numbers had been taken away in their sins, notwithstanding all the warnings given them, tended to render these topics more affecting. The repetition of this and similar warnings, after Jerusalem was taken and destroyed, showed that they did not refer merely to the circumstances of those times; but were applicable to individuals in every place, especially to those who are favoured with the oracles of God. 'He showeth that the people 'ought to have continually governors and teachers who 'may have a care over them, and warn them ever of the 'dangers which are at hand. The wicked shall not escape 'punishment, though the watchman be negligent: but if 'the watchman blow the trumpet, and then he will not 'obey, he shall deserve double punishment.' (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10. 'If, according to thy propheeies, God have 'determined to reckon with us for our sins, and to bring 'judgment upon us, to what purpose shall our conversion 'be? and how shall we live though we do amend?' (Bp. Hall.)—'Thus the wicked when they hear God's judg-'ments for their sins, despair of his mercies, and murmur,' (xxiv. 23.)—The impenitent Jews seem to have charged inconsistency and contradiction upon the prophet's messages: for whilst he warned them to repent, and assured the penitent of forgiveness; he also predicted that the people would pine away in their transgressions. 'Now,' said they, 'if this be the case, how should we live? And 'of what use are your exhortations and promises? You 'only tantalize us, and there is no sincerity in these pro-

11 Say unto them, [u] As I live, saith the Lord GOD, [x] I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his way and live: [y] turn ye, turn ye from your evil ways; for why will ye die, O house of Israel?

12 Therefore, thou son of man, [z] say unto the children of thy people, [a] The righteousness of the righteous shall not deliver him in the day of his transgression: [b] as for the wickedness of the wicked, he shall not fall thereby, in the day that he turneth from his wickedness; neither shall the righteous be able to live for his righteousness in the day that he sinneth.

13 When I shall say to the righteous, that he shall surely live; [c] if he trust to his own righteousness, and commit iniquity, all his righteousnesses shall not be remembered; but for his iniquity that he hath committed, [d] he shall die for it.

14 Again, when I say unto the wicked, [e] Thou shalt surely die; [f] if he turn from his sin, and do * that which is lawful and right;

15 If the wicked [g] restore the pledge, give again that he had robbed, [i] walk in the statutes of life, without committing iniquity; [k] he shall surely live, he shall not die.

16 None [l] of his sins that he hath committed shall be mentioned unto him: he hath done that which is lawful and right; he shall surely live.

17 Yet [m] the children of thy people say, The way of the LORD is not equal: but, as for them, their way is not equal.

18 When [n] the righteous turneth from his righteousness, and committeth iniquity, he shall even die thereby.

19 But [o] if the wicked turn from his wickedness, and do that which is lawful and right, he shall live thereby.

20 Yet ye say, The way of the LORD is not equal. O ye house of Israel, [p] I will judge you every one after his ways.

21 ¶ And it came to pass [q] in the twelfth year of our captivity, in the tenth month, in the fifth day of the month, that [r] one that had escaped out of Jerusalem came unto me, saying, [s] The city is smitten.

22 Now [t] the hand of the LORD was upon me in the evening, afore he that posals: our ruin is decreed, and none of our repentance can prevent it.' But in reality the prediction implied, that the people in general would be obstinately impenitent; though some individuals would repent and be pardoned. It showed, indeed, that the ruin of the city and nation was determined; but it did not relate to the final state of individuals, who would still be dealt with according to the rules before mentioned, and here again repeated.

V. 11. (Notes, xviii. 23—32.) The Lord had before demanded of the people, whether they supposed that he had any pleasure in the death of the wicked? But he here confirmed it with an oath, that he had none; as it was his delight that sinners should repent and live.—The verse may be rendered, "As I live, saith the Lord God, I am not delighted "with the death of a sinner; but, I am delighted, when "the wicked turns from his way and lives." (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12, 13. (Notes, &c. iii. 20, 21. xviii.) The same truths are here again stated that have before been considered, but with some variation of expression: especially it is here added, that if the righteous man trust to his own righteousness and to the promises of life made to the righteous, and commit iniquity, his righteousness will not profit him. Men who think themselves righteous, and are so accounted by others, but who are not truly humble and spiritual, will, in one way or other, trust in their own righteousness. Some will so confide in their own supposed good works, as to neglect or despise the salvation of the Gospel: and yet whilst they trust to their own righteousness to justify them, the iniquities which they commit will most certainly condemn them. Others think, that as they are clear in their views, bold in their profession of the Gospel, zealous for its doctrines, and do much to promote them; it would be unbelief to doubt of their being true Christians, though they indulge their darling sins in secret, or grasp at immoderate or unlawful advantages. Thus they count themselves righteous persons, favourites of heaven, and interested in the promises of life: and yet they commit iniquity, and practically fall into the old detestable aphorism, "Let us sin on, that grace may "abound." Others, having for a time made a plausible profession of religion, conclude themselves certainly converted: and then venture into sin upon the supposition that God will not damn them for it; and quiet their consciences by abusing the doctrine of final perseverance, and the examples of some believers, of whom it is recorded in Scripture, that they fell into the same sins. It is possible for a true believer to be caught in any of these nets for a time: the only question is, whether he will or will not eventually be delivered from them, though by sharp rebukes and corrections, and thus return to God with weeping and supplication?

V. 14—16. (Note, xviii. 21—23.) 'The sin is not 'forgiven, unless what is taken away be restored.' Augustin.) 'He condemneth all of them of hypocrisy, who 'pretend to forsake wickedness, and yet declare not themselves such by their fruits; that is, in obeying God's commandments, and by a godly life.'

V. 17—20. (Notes, xviii. 25—29.)

was escaped came; and had opened my mouth, until he came to me in the morning: [u] and my mouth was opened, and I was no more dumb.

23 Then the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

24 Son of man, [x] they that inhabit those wastes of the land of Israel speak, saying, [y] Abraham was one, and he inherited the land: [z] but we are many; the land is given us for inheritance.

25 Wherefore say unto them, Thus saith the Lord GOD; [a] Ye eat with the blood, and [b] lift up your eyes towards your idols, [c] and shed blood: and shall ye possess the land?

26 Ye [d] stand upon your sword, ye [e] work abomination, [f] and ye defile every one his neighbour's wife: [g] and shall ye possess the land?

27 Say thou thus unto them, Thus saith the Lord GOD; As I live, [h] surely they that are in the wastes, shall fall by the sword, and him that is in the open field will I give to the beasts * to be devoured, and they that be in the forts, and in the caves, shall die of the pestilence.

28 For [k] I will lay the land † most desolate, [l] and the pomp of her strength shall cease, [m] and the mountains of Israel shall be desolate, that none shall pass through.

29 Then [n] shall they know that I am the LORD, when I have laid the land most desolate, [o] because of all their abominations which they have committed.

30 ¶ Also, thou son of man, [p] the children of thy people still are talking ‡ against thee by the walls, and in the doors of the houses, and speak one to another, every one to his brother, saying, [q] Come, I pray you, and hear what is the word that cometh forth from the LORD.

31 And they come unto thee § as the people cometh, and ‖ they sit before thee as my people, [r] and they hear thy words, but they will not do them: [s] for with their mouth they * show much love, [t] but their heart goeth after their covetousness.

32 And, lo, thou art unto them as † a very lovely song [u] of one that hath a pleasant voice, and can play well on an instrument: for they hear thy words, but they do them not.

33 And [x] when this cometh to pass, (lo, it will come,) then [y] shall they know that a prophet hath been among them.

V. 21, 22. According to the date here given, this fugitive Jew did not come to the prophet, with the intelligence of Jerusalem's being smitten, till almost eighteen months after that event: and some learned men have supposed, that there is a mistake in the date, or that it ought to be calculated differently. No doubt, however, the prophet had heard of that event long before eighteen months had elapsed: but perhaps he had not received that full and authentic account of it from an eye-witness, which he was taught to expect, before he delivered any further messages from God to his people: (Note, xxiv. 25—27.) For above three years he had been dumb, in this respect at least: perhaps he had been able to converse with the Jews, concerning the predictions that he had formerly delivered to them; and perhaps he spake, or delivered in writing, to them, the prophecies which he uttered concerning other nations: but he had received no further revelation from God respecting their affairs; in this sense he had been dumb. But now his mouth was opened, and he prophesied to them as aforetime.

V. 24—29. A small remnant continued in the land under Gedaliah after the desolations of Jerusalem; and, notwithstanding all their crimes and miseries, they flattered themselves that they were entitled to the inheritance of the whole land. The promise of it had been made to Abraham when he had no children; yet his posterity had inherited it: but the remaining Jews were many; and they supposed themselves on that account more likely to keep possession of it. They, however, overlooked the contrariety of their character to that of Abraham: they forgot that they had forfeited the title by their crimes; and that both former and latter prophets had predicted these desolations of the land. Thus they presumptuously expected to prosper in sin, and to be enriched by the ruin of their brethren. But the Lord sent them a message which was widely different from their expectations. In defiance of his law, and in conformity to the abominable superstitions of the nations, they ate with the blood and worshipped idols; they committed murder and made their sword the arbiter of their disputes, violently defending themselves in injustice: they were guilty of adultery and every abomination; and was it fitting that they should possess the land, from which their brethren had been driven for similar crimes? On the contrary, the Lord solemnly sware by himself, that they should all be destroyed by one or other of his judgments, wherever they took refuge; and that the land should be utterly desolated, and be deprived of all that pomp and strength in which they gloried. This was fulfilled, after the murder of Gedaliah, when the survivors fled into Egypt, where they miserably perished.

V. 30—33. Whilst the prophet was affectionately seeking the good of his people; they were continually talking of him, or against him, wherever they met together. He was their constant topic, and it was their recreation to animadvert on him, or to ridicule him. But he would perhaps never have known it; had not the Lord seen it good, that he should reprove them in his name for it. They invited each other to come and hear the word of the Lord from him; and they came and sat before him with the same apparent seriousness, as the most pious people could do: they gave him a patient and apparently an attentive hearing; yea, they professed much love to him and his doctrine: but their hearts were possessed by covetousness; their leading affections and desires went forth after riches: they loved their money more than either God or man, the prophet, his word, or their own souls: and therefore they would not part with one gainful sin, for all that he could say; but would rather cavil at it or ridicule it. Indeed his voice and manner, his graceful elocution, cogent arguments, or apt illustrations, rendered him to them "as a "very lovely song of one that had a pleasant voice and "could play well on an instrument;" (in which the sound is commonly more attended to, than the meaning of the words sung;) but they did not receive his words as a message from God, with a reverential and obedient faith; as it appeared from their subsequent conduct. But when the preceding prophecies, concerning the total desolations of the land, were accomplished, as they certainly would be; they would know, that he was not merely "a sounding "brass, or tinkling cymbal;" but that a prophet of the Lord had been among them, whose words would be verified in the ruin of all that despised or disobeyed them.—'They came to hear thee for their entertainment, not for 'their edification, as many go to hear famed and eloquent 'preachers. St. Augustine tells us, that he himself was 'such an auditor of St. Ambrose, before he was converted. '—I heard him diligently when he discoursed in the con'gregation: but not with that application of mind which 'I ought to have done: but I came rather out of curiosity, 'to know whether his eloquence was answerable to that 'opinion the world had of him. I was very attentive to 'his style, and charmed with the sweetness of his delivery; 'but had little value or concern for the subjects he treated 'of.' (Lowth.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—20.

How much wiser are men in their temporal, than in their spiritual and eternal concerns! They set watchmen to guard their houses from robbers or conflagrations; and centinels to give warning of the approach of the enemy: and they best approve of those who are most quick sighted and vigilant, who see the danger at a distance and give the most decisive alarm; and he who should not give warning, would be deemed of man, as well as of God, accessary to the death of those who were slain through his neglect. But in the concerns of God and eternity, where the appointed watchmen are infinitely more concerned to be faithful, and to give the alarm in the plainest manner; they are sure to give offence to numbers, if they obey their Master's commands! When they cause the trumpet to give so certain a sound, that every sinner is made to feel himself to be the wicked man, who is "warned to flee "from the wrath to come;" and when the terrors of the Lord are so placed before men's eyes, that they tremble at the prospect of eternal damnation, great will be the indignation and opposition excited against them. The most blind, drowsy, greedy, dumb watchman, that can be found, is preferred by an immense majority, to one that is thus awful in his warnings, and close in his application to their consciences: they are ready to say to their teachers, "Speak "smooth things, prophesy deceits, cause the Holy One of "Israel to cease from before us:" and any one of Ahab's lying prophets will be more acceptable, than Michaiah the prophet of the Lord, whom they hate, because he always prophesies evil concerning them!—We cannot then "be "men-pleasers and the servants of Christ:" but the faithful watchman alone will deliver his own soul; they who perish from under his ministry, will have none to blame but themselves; and he will doubtless have many seals to his ministry, to be "his joy and crown in the day of Jesus "Christ:" whilst the unfaithful watchman will be condemned as the murderer of all those who perish in their sins, through his negligence, flatteries, and lies. We that are ministers should frequently meditate on these subjects, and state them to our hearers: that they may understand on what ground we stand, and on what principles we act; and perceive, that we must be plain and faithful, if we would either "save ourselves or those that hear us." But when ungodly men are determined to continue in sin, they will be very ingenious in devising some shadow of a reason for their most unreasonable conduct: and they will endeavour to fasten a charge of inconsistency on those who declare the whole counsel of God: they will pervert the most humiliating truths into a quietus to their consciences, and an excuse for their sloth and lusts; as if God were the Author of their sins, because he is the Giver of every good and perfect gift! Thus they rush out of presumption into a kind of desperation, which is often no more than a flimzy covering of downright infidelity; and they pretend that it is of no use to repent, or pray, or use the means of grace, because it is decreed that some sinners, (they cannot know who,) shall be left to themselves, and perish in hardened impenitency and unbelief! It is hard to say, whether such men are more desirous of deceiving themselves, or satan of deceiving them. But surely it proves a strong determination of mind to unbelief: when the Lord declares and confirms it with an oath, that "he "hath no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but rather "that he should repent and live," that men will not believe him: but instead of attending to his pressing exhortation to turn from their evil ways; as if they were in love with death and damnation, to employ themselves in multiplying cavils and objections, which only tend to charge God with injustice, and are constructive blasphemy. For he who can do all other things, hath declared that it is impossible tend them in their pastures and fold, 11—16; to punish the powerful oppressors among the Jews, and to rescue the oppressed, 17—22. Figurative predictions of Christ and his kingdom, 23—31.

AND the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, for him to lie, to do injustice, or to deny himself. Let us then bless his holy name, for the provisions of his grace and the security of his word, which assure the true penitent of complete forgiveness and eternal life: and let us also study to profit by his warnings to the righteous, not to trust in their righteousness and commit iniquity; and then we shall see cause to bless his name for these also. "Blessed is he that feareth always:" but they who so confide in the promises made to God's people, and so presume themselves to be of that number, as to be emboldened to commit iniquity, convert the very mercy and truth of God into "a savour of death," and an occasion of condemnation to their souls: whilst they, who so fear the threatenings of the law, denouncing the sinner's death and damnation, as to take warning from it to repent and turn from all their sins, change that most awful curse into "a "savour of life" to their souls. But such penitents always "do works meet for repentance:" and whilst they trust only in God's mercy through Jesus Christ, they conscientiously make restitution, as far as they are able, for all the injustice and robbery that they have committed; they walk in the ordinances of God and his statutes of life, without returning to the practice of iniquity: they "do "justice, love mercy, and walk humbly with their God;" and they shall surely live, and not die. Instead therefore of listening to the suggestions of the devil, of wicked men, or of our own evil hearts, as if the Lord's ways were not equal, let us condemn our own ways before him as unrighteous, and seek that "repentance, which is unto sal-"vation not to be repented of:" let us watch against all hypocrisy, and reject every temptation to apostacy, or to pride and self-confidence: and, "building up ourselves in "our most holy faith, and praying in the Holy Ghost, let us "keep ourselves in the love of God, looking for the mercy "of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life.

V. 21—33.

It is a peculiar mercy in times of public calamity, for the Lord to open the mouths of his faithful ministers, and to give them a door of utterance; that they may teach the sufferers how to find comfort under their afflictions, and to derive benefit from them. But how inveterate are the selfishness and presumption of ungodly men! They can rejoice in the misery and death of multitudes, and even of their nearest relations, if they have expectations of being enriched by them! They often claim an interest in the peculiar blessings engaged to true believers; whilst their whole conduct as evidently proves them the enemies, as Abraham's faith and obedience proved him the friend of God! And they can call this groundless presumption, strong faith! when the whole testimony of God declares them to be the children of the devil, entitled to all the threatenings, and to nothing else! For, however men may deceive themselves with vain words, adulterers, thieves, liars, slanderers, covetous persons, and such like, have no inheritance in the promised land; because "for these things "the wrath of God cometh upon the children of disobe-"dience." Wherever such men seek shelter, evil pursueth them; and they will assuredly perish because of all their abominations. But however unexceptionable the conduct and scriptural the doctrine be, of that man of God who constantly affirms such truths, he will be sure to be persecuted, at least with the scourge of the tongue: and it is generally well for faithful ministers, that they do not hear the contemptuous, malicious, and hard speeches, which ungodly men use of them behind their backs; for it would tend to exasperate or to discourage them. Such persons, however, should remember, that the Lord notes down all the words, which they speak by the walls or the doors of their houses; and considers them to be effusions of their contempt and enmity against him. (Jude 14, 15.) And their malice and scorn are aggravated by hypocrisy, when they come amongst God's people, to sit and hear his word, on purpose to quarrel with it or ridicule it; as Satan came among the sons of God, to obtain permission to do Job mischief. But indeed various corrupt motives induce men to frequent the places where the word of God is most faithfully preached. Many, who seem to come with alacrity and to hear with attention, are brought by direct enmity, that they may find somewhat to object to or oppose; and they even persuade others to accompany them, that they may join in the same profane opposition. Far more come out of curiosity. Some to exhibit themselves, to form connexions, to please their friends, or to establish a reputation. Others make a religion wholly of hearing: and suppose themselves excellent Christians, because they attend on faithful preachers, commend their sermons, and with their mouth show much love to the men and their messages: whilst they will not practise what they hear, but their hearts are wholly turned unto covetousness. Others have a taste for ingenuity, elocution, or graceful delivery: and they find out preachers who have talents of this kind; and hearing them is their amusement, instead of a concert or an opera; especially at those leisure-hours when no other places of recreation are open. Thus even the gifts, as well as the faithfulness, of ministers, become a savour of death to those who hear and are delighted with their words, as "with the very lovely song of one, that hath a "pleasant voice, or can play well on an instrument," but will not do them. It often happens, however, that they who come at first from such carnal motives, are afterwards brought to a better sense of things, and become doers as well as hearers of the word. So that the minister may be encouraged to be faithful and instant in preaching the word; without anxiously inquiring what brought his auditory together: and then whether men will hear, or forbear, they will know by the event, that a servant of God hath been among them; and he will be received at last by his Judge, with, "Well done, good and faithful servant, "enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

2 Son of man, prophesy against [a] the shepherds of Israel, prophesy, and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord GOD unto the shepherds; [b] Woe be to the shepherds of Israel that do feed themselves! should not the shepherds [c] feed the flocks?

3 Ye [d] eat the fat, and ye clothe you with the wool, [e] ye kill them that are fed: but ye feed not the flock.

4 The [f] diseased have ye not strengthened, neither have ye healed that which was sick, neither have ye bound up that which was broken, neither have ye brought again that which was driven away, neither have ye [g] sought that which was lost; [h] but with force and with cruelty have ye ruled them.

5 And [i] they were scattered, * because there is no shepherd: [k] and they became meat to all the beasts of the field, when they were scattered.

6 My sheep [l] wandered through all the mountains, and upon every high hill: yea, my flock was scattered upon all the face of the earth, [m] and none did search or seek after them.

7 ¶ Therefore, [n] ye shepherds, hear the word of the LORD;

8 As I live, saith the Lord GOD, surely because [o] my flock became a prey, and my flock became meat to every beast of the field, because there was no shepherd; neither did my shepherds search for my flock, but [p] the shepherds fed themselves, and fed not my flock;

9 Therefore, [q] O ye shepherds, hear the word of the LORD;

10 Thus saith the Lord GOD; Behold, [r] I am against the shepherds; [s] and I will require my flock at their hand, [t] and cause them to cease from feeding the flock; neither shall the shepherds feed themselves any more; [u] for I will deliver my flock from their mouth, that they may not be meat for them.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXIV. V. 2—6. (Notes, &c. Is. lvi. 9—12. Jer. xxiii. 1—4.) Jerusalem was destroyed, the land desolated, and the Lord's flock scattered or destroyed; and the wicked shepherds were about to be called to account as the principal criminals who had occasioned so great an evil. "The shepherds of Israel," signifies their rulers and teachers; their kings and princes, priests and prophets, scribes and elders. The duty of the shepherd is to feed the flock, and to make that his principal object: but they were only careful to feed themselves. They had eaten the fat, or the milk of the flock, clothed themselves with the wool, and killed the fattest of the sheep, without regarding what became of the rest. They made every advantage they could from their offices; they exacted their tributes and taxes, their tythes and perquisites, with great earnestness; and they oppressed, and even destroyed the people to enrich themselves: but they bestowed no pains to provide for the welfare of the state, or of the souls of those intrusted to them. They resembled those shepherds, who utterly neglect the weak and sickly of the flock, and leave them to die without attempting their recovery; who, if any have their bones broken or are wounded, do not bind them up; and if any are driven away by robbers or wild beasts, or wander from the fold, never seek to bring them back: but treat them with great cruelty, and are more like ravening wolves, than careful tender shepherds. Thus the rulers of Israel had neglected to rescue the oppressed, to relieve the destitute, to remedy grievances, to provide properly for the public safety, to redeem those that had been driven into captivity, or to encourage the return of such as had taken refuge among idolaters. Their teachers also were equally negligent of their souls: they neither encouraged the weak and wavering; nor attempted to remove their error, ignorance, or wickedness, by wholesome instructions, counsels, and examples; nor reclaimed those that were turned aside to idolatry: but they employed their power in exacting upon the people, and made their sacred office a pretence for the most cruel oppressions and persecutions. By these means the people were scattered from the temple, as abhorring the sacrifices of the Lord: and from Jerusalem and Judah, to escape the tyranny of their rulers; and so became as sheep without a shepherd. And by the impolicy, impiety, and wickedness of their leaders, and the fatal effects of their bad use of their authority, they were at length given up to be a prey to the Assyrians and Chaldeans, and other nations, to be destroyed or carried into captivity; so that in the event the land was utterly desolated, and the Lord's flock, his visible Church, was left to wander on the dark mountains of the heathen, and was scattered over the face of the earth. This was equally applicable to the rulers, priests, and scribes in the days of Christ, and to the subsequent doom and condition of the Jewish nation. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7—10. For the crimes before charged on the shepherds of Israel, and here again repeated, the Lord declared himself to be against them, and threatened to require of them the flock which he had committed to them, and which had been ruined by their fault. He would discharge them from their office, and deprive them of all the emoluments of it; and as they would not feed, so they should not be allowed to devour the flock. The descendants of David were from this time excluded from the temporal kingdom; the family of Aaron and the tribe of Levi were at length laid aside from their sacred functions; and numbers, both of magistrates and teachers, were entirely de-

11 ¶ For thus saith the Lord GOD; Behold [x] I, even I, will both [y] search my sheep, and seek them out.

12 * As a shepherd seeketh out his flock, in the day that he is among his sheep that are scattered; so will I seek out my sheep, and will deliver them out of all places, where they have been scattered [z] in the cloudy and dark day.

13 And [a] I will bring them out from the people, and gather them from the countries, and will bring them to their own land, [b] and feed them upon the mountains of Israel by the rivers, and in all the inhabited places of the country.

14 I will [c] feed them in a good pasture, and upon the high mountains of Israel shall their fold be: [d] there shall they lie in a good fold, and in a fat pasture shall they feed upon the mountains of Israel.

15 I will feed my flock, and [e] I will cause them to lie down, saith the Lord GOD.

16 I will [f] seek that which was lost, and bring again that which was driven away, and will bind up that which was broken, and will strengthen that which was sick: [g] but I will destroy the fat and the strong; [h] I will feed them with judgment.

17 And as for you, O my flock, thus saith the Lord GOD; Behold, [i] I judge between † cattle and cattle, between the rams and the ‡ he-goats.

18 Seemeth it [k] a small thing unto you [l] to have eaten up the good pasture, but ye must [m] tread down with your feet the residue of your pastures? and to have drunk of the deep waters, but ye must foul the residue with your feet?

19 And as for my flock, they eat that which ye have trodden with your feet; and they drink that which ye have fouled with your feet.

20 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD unto them; [n] Behold I, even I, will judge between the fat cattle and between the lean cattle.

21 Because [o] ye have thrust with side and with shoulder, and pushed all the diseased with your horns, till ye have scattered them abroad:

22 Therefore [p] will I save my flock, and they shall no more be a prey; and I will judge between cattle and cattle.

prived of power to oppress the people and enrich themselves. 'I will require a severe account of their kings and princes, 'priests and prophets, of the damage my people have sus- 'tained through their ill management; and I will deprive 'them of that honour and pre-eminence which they have 'made such an ill use of; as I have already displaced Ze- 'dekiah, and the princes and priests, and others that were in 'authority under him.' (Lowth.)

V. 11—16. The Lord having denounced sentence on the shepherds of Israel, next intimated his merciful intentions towards the scattered flock. These he would search for and find out, wherever they were. As the shepherd, when his flock has been scattered by wild beasts, gathers them together as soon as he can: and having numbered them to see how many are still wanting, he spends the day in seeking for them and bringing them back: so the Lord would seek out his sheep, which had been dispersed by the Chaldeans, in that dark and cloudy day when they besieged and took Jerusalem. He would gather them from all countries, whither they had been driven as exiles and captives: he would bring them to their own land, and there perform towards them every part of the Shepherd's office. But at the same time he would punish their proud oppressors, and feed them with judgment, distinguishing betwixt them according to their characters, as it is afterwards declared. Doubtless this primarily referred to the restoration of the Jews from captivity, and their re-establishment and prosperity in their own land: and it was typical of the good Shepherd's tender care of, and kindness to, the souls of his people and to his Church in every age even to the end of the world. (Marg. Ref.) 'But it 'seems to look further, even to the general restoration of 'the whole nation, which most of the prophets foretel shall 'come to pass in the latter days.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.) The express promises here given, that JEHOVAH himself will feed his flock, in the predicted times, compared with the language of the New Testament concerning Christ, our good, and great, and chief Shepherd; contains an unanswerable argument in proof of his Deity, as one with the Father.

V. 17—22. The whole nation seemed to be the Lord's flock; yet they were of very different characters: but he knew how to distinguish betwixt them, "as the shepherd "divideth the sheep from the goats." The rams and he-goats, or the fat and strong, denoted the rich and powerful, the proud and self-sufficient, the wise and learned of this world. These had got possession of the best estates, and lived in magnificence, luxury, and sensuality: and not contented with this, they would not suffer the poor to use their leavings in comfort; but continually harassed them with usurious exactions and impositions, with suits and prosecutions, and by every means reduced them to the most abject penury and misery: as if strong and fat cattle, the rams and he-goats, having eaten up the best of the pasture and drunk the deep waters; should wantonly tread down and spoil the residue of the pasture, and muddy the water;

23 And [q] I will set up one Shepherd over them, and he shall feed them, even [r] my servant David; he shall feed them, and he shall be their Shepherd.

24 And [s] I the LORD will be their God, and my servant David [t] a Prince among them; I the LORD have spoken it.

25 And [u] I will make with them a covenant of peace, [x] and will cause the evil beasts to cease out of the land: [y] and they shall dwell safely in the wilderness, and sleep in the woods.

26 And I will [z] make them and the places round about [a] my hill a blessing; and I will cause the shower to come down in his season; there shall be [b] showers of blessing.

27 And [c] the tree of the field shall yield her fruit, and the earth shall yield her increase, and they shall be safe in their land, and shall [d] know that I am the LORD, [e] when I have broken the bands of their yoke, and delivered them out of the hand of those that [f] served themselves of them.

28 And [g] they shall no more be a prey to the heathen, [h] neither shall the beasts of the land devour them; but they shall dwell safely, and none shall make them afraid.

29 And [i] I will raise up for them a Plant * of renown, and they shall be no more † consumed with hunger in the land, [k] neither bear the shame of the heathen any more.

30 Thus shall [l] they know that I the LORD their God am with them, and that they, even the house of Israel, are my people, saith the Lord GOD.

31 And [m] ye my flock, the flock of my pasture, are men, [n] and I am your God, saith the Lord GOD.

that the other cattle might starve, or be forced to feed on disrelishing and unwholesome food. This may also be applied to the corrupting of the fountains of religious instruction by the scribes and priests, who "rendered the "word of God of none effect, through their traditions," or those false glosses which they hired the false teachers to put upon it. But the Lord intended to plead the cause of the poor, the fatherless, and the widow, against their rich and proud oppressers: that the fat cattle might be led to the slaughter, and the lean possess the pasture. The former had used all their superior power to annoy and plague the latter; so the Lord would save them from their hands, and execute judgments upon them. (Marg. Ref.)

Seemeth, &c. 'This reproof may filtly be applied to 'those great persons who take no care that the poor may 'enjoy their benefit of their superfluities; but rather let 'them be thrown away and perish, than they will be at 'the trouble of seeing them disposed of for the good of 'those that want.' (Lowth.) 'By good pasture and deep 'waters, is meant the pure word of God, and the admini-'stration of justice, which they did not distribute to the poor 'till they had corrupted it.'

V. 23—31. 'Christ is elsewhere styled David, as 'being the person in whom all the promises made to 'David are fulfilled. The expression may also allude to 'David's first employment of a shepherd.' (Lowth.) This is evidently a prophecy of Christ, and of the most glorious times of his Church on earth. The Lord saved his ancient flock from oppressors and false teachers, and at length raised up among them, and set over them and his Church, that one good Shepherd, whom he had promised from the beginning. He was called DAVID, because he was descended from, and typified by, that favoured king of Israel: and because he was a Ruler and Teacher of his people after God's own heart, (Ps. lxxvii. 71, 72.) The word David signifies "Beloved;" and he is the well beloved Son of the Father, in whom he is well pleased. In him the Lord is indeed the God and Portion of his chosen flock; and this his Servant and Son is a prince among them, being "Head over all things to his Church." Through the blood of his cross the covenant of peace is made with all his willing subjects, who are the sheep of his pasture; and it is established on better promises than that made with the nation of Israel. It would tend much to the security of a flock of sheep, to have all ravenous beasts extirpated from the land: thus the Lord engaged effectually to defend his Church, in the days of this promised Shepherd, from all their enemies, who resemble lions, tigers, wolves, or subtle foxes: so that his sheep might dwell safely and rest comfortably, even in the most perilous places. For though the powers of darkness, persecutors, and seducers, have harassed the Church hitherto; yet they have not prevailed against it, nor against any true believer: and ere long Satan shall be chained up, and all persecution and antichristian corruptions shall be terminated. Under this good Shepherd the Church, and all those favoured spots where there are spiritual folds of his sheep, would be made a blessing to the places round about: their pastures would be regularly watered with the rain of heavenly grace; showers of blessings would descend upon their souls, while attending on divine ordinances; the numbers of believers would thus rapidly increase, and the grace and peace of the whole company of them would abound. This would especially be the case, when the Lord had broken the yoke of their oppressors, who had enslaved them for their own mercenary purposes: then the heathen would no more be suffered to prey upon them, nor persecutors to devour them; but they would dwell without danger or terror. The Lord also promised to raise up to them "a Plant of Renown:" this also means Christ; who, though infinitely excellent in himself, and adored by holy angels, was "as a tender plant out of a dry ground," in his incarnation, humiliation, and death; but springing up in his resurrection, ascension, and heavenly glory, he became greatly renowned on earth, by the spread of the Gospel through the nations. And being indeed the Tree of Life, bearing all the fruits of salvation, he yields spiritual food to the souls of his people, on which they 'feed in 'their hearts by faith with thanksgiving.' So that the true Israel shall not be destroyed by famine, or made ashamed among the heathen; as the nation of Israel has been.—This could have but a typical accomplishment in the return of the Jews from captivity under Zerubbabel and their subsequent prosperity. Even the success of the Gospel in the primitive times and the preservation of the Church hitherto, form only partial completions of it. But the destruction of antichrist, the calling of the Gentiles, the restoration of the Jews into the Church and to their own land, and the consequent peace and prosperity of the Church and of the world, fully answer to the energetic language of these predictions.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

No rank or office in the Church, or in society, can exempt men from the reproofs of God's word, when they neglect their duty and abuse the trust reposed in them: and if the shepherds of Israel, of the Lord's own appointment, feed themselves and not the flock, wo be unto them! Indeed too many rulers, even in Christian countries, seem entirely to have forgotten the end of their appointment; and have acted as if they had been advanced to authority, to gratify their own ambition, cruelty, avarice, luxury, or lust, at the expense of those whose welfare they ought to have sought in every action, as their great object, in connexion with the glory of God and the salvation of their own souls. So that, whilst they have utterly neglected to protect the poor and industrious from the oppressions of the rich; to redress public grievances, to provide for the destitute, and to guard the peace and prosperity of the community, they have awed men into submission by force and cruelty, and thus for a time silenced every murmur against their tyrannical measures, their oppressive taxes, and inhuman executions. Thus they have indulged the mean ambition of growing rich by impoverishing their subjects, and of governing over a company of abject miserable slaves with uncontrolled authority. Such attempts depopulate flourishing kingdoms, and either scatter their inhabitants, by driving them for refuge to other nations; or cause them to be cut off, by exciting insurrections, encouraging invasions, or making way for destructive wars. Though there should be no man able or willing to remedy these evils; yet the Lord will show himself against such shepherds: he will soon deprive them of their abused authority, and call them to account for all the mischief which their crimes have occasioned; and deliver the people from their mouth that they may not be meat for them. But when this negligence, avarice, and wickedness, are found in the pastors and rulers of the Church: when they feed themselves, but through sloth and ignorance take no care to feed the flock; when they are only intent upon obtaining and multiplying rich benefices, that they may eat the fat and riot in luxury: when they never attempt to instruct the ignorant, to reclaim the erroneous, to alarm the careless, to encourage the broken-hearted, the distressed, and tempted; to reform the profligate or restore the backslider; or in any ways to bring men to repentance, to faith in Christ, to establish peace and holiness of life: but when they domineer over men's consciences with force and cruelty, as if they were lords over God's heritage; and fleece and butcher the flock which he hath purchased with his blood: when they waste the Church by fierce persecutions or infect it with damnable heresies: when the sheep are scattered, because there is no shepherd, but a wolf instead of one; and so fall into divisions and errors, forsake the word and ordinances of God, and are seduced into impiety or infidelity: in this case the guilt of the shepherd is, and his punishment will be, most aggravated. All the souls, that perish through the default of such men, will be required at their hands; the Lord will be against them, as they are evidently enemies to him; they will be driven from their office with contempt and detestation; and stripped of all their honours and emoluments; and their flocks will be delivered from such devourers.

V. 11—22.

The Lord will take care, that none of his true sheep shall finally wander or be lost, through the misconduct of those who are idle shepherds and greedy dogs. He will either raise up for them shepherds after his own heart; or he will supply the want of them by his own care; and will both seek and find every one of them, and convey them to his fold rejoicing. Thus the incarnate Son of God came into this dreary wilderness to seek and save that which was lost: personally, in the days of his flesh, he went about seeking the lost sheep of the house of Israel; and by his apostles and his ministers ever since, he hath also gone to search them out all over the Gentile world. Wherever his elect people are scattered, in the days of their darkness and ignorance, he finds them out and brings them into his fold. He also comes to their relief in the dark and cloudy days of persecution and temptation; he heals their backslidings, leads them forth in the paths of righteousness, feeds them in the rich pastures of his ordinances, folds them under his omnipotent protection, and causes them to rest and repose their souls upon his love and faithfulness. He seeks those that wander, and brings back that which was driven away; he binds up the broken-hearted and heals the diseased. And ought not his ministers then to do the same? Surely none but hirelings will value the emolument or reputation of the ministry more than this good and useful work: and the true pastor will be ready to endure hardship, to bear reproach and persecution; and to spend and lay down his life for the same ends for which the chief Shepherd shed his precious blood. But, alas! how few in comparison have there been hitherto, who have laboured and suffered in this disinterested, self-denying, humble, patient, and zealous manner! How few are there, who thus keep themselves pure from the blood of all men! Of how many will the souls of multitudes be required by the chief Shepherd at his appearance, when his faithful servants will receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away! Even in this respect, "broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many "there be that go in thereat:" and still it may be said, "All "seek their own, and not the things that are Jesus "Christ's." But there is as much difference in character, among professed Christians, as among those who bear the name and wear the garb of ministers. It seldom happens that the fat and the strong, the rich and prosperous, are the most flourishing part of Christian congregations: and the proud and self-sufficient are always the enemies of the true Gospel, and of true believers. Such men are the rams and the he-goats of the flock: they are ambitious of domineering in the church as well as in the world: and whilst they think no possession or indulgence too great for themselves, and no subsistence too mean and scanty for their poor brethren; the word of God also must be preached, and his ordinances administered, as best suits their conveniency, interest, conscience, or humour! Thus, through their undue influence, the pasture is trodden down, and the waters are fouled: the good food of pure, experimental, distinguishing preaching, is changed for a more distant, polite, smooth, fashionable, and flattering strain; and the streams of sound doctrine are corrupted. And whilst they thus seem to eat up the good pasture, and to drink the deep waters, the poor in spirit, that relish nothing but the Bread and Water of life, are starved; for they cannot live upon such unwholesome provisions. Whilst we should properly guard against such persons, we must leave it to the Lord to judge betwixt cattle and cattle: and when he cometh to separate betwixt the sheep and the goats, (if not before,) he will destroy the fat and the strong, and feed them with judgment.

V. 23—31.

Our good Shepherd hath already ransomed his chosen flock, and is placed as a Prince over his people. His covenant of peace has been ratified with many: nor shall either temptation or enemy separate them from his love; but they shall dwell, and rest safely, even in this howling wilderness, pass securely through the valley of death, and sleep in his arms, as it were, in the silent grave. Yet the Church is still infested with roaring lions, and ravening wolves, and every evil beast, and is exposed to manifold persecutions; is yet as to many things in captivity, and is comparatively of small extent and exceedingly corrupted. We have therefore much yet to hope and to pray for in this behalf. In our several situations we should aim so to live and labour in faith and love, and so to watch unto prayer, that we may become blessings to all around us; and that showers of blessings may descend on our souls, and the congregations to which we belong. Our constant desire and prayer should be, that there may be showers of blessings in every place, where the truth of Christ is preached; that numerous converts may spring up on every side; that all who profess the Gospel may be filled with the fruits of righteousness; that the yoke of Satan, and of every antichrist, may be broken, and the Church delivered from all those who have made religion subservient to their personal or political interests: that Jews and Gentiles may be united in Christ Jesus, and form one Church; that every partition wall may be broken down, every corruption purged out, and every boundary removed; and that "the earth may be filled with the knowledge "of the LORD, as the waters cover the sea." When thus the nations shall all become acquainted with the Plant of Renown, who both is the Feeder and Food of his people; famines and pestilences, as well as wars, will probably cease through all the earth: and it will be known in a most glorious manner, that the Lord is with his Church, and that they are his people and he their God. In the mean time let us admire, and rejoice in, his condescending love, who hath chosen us rebellious men to be the sheep of his pasture, and is become our Shepherd and Salvation: and let us "hear his voice, and follow him, and "he will give us eternal life, and we shall never perish; "neither shall any one ever pluck us out of his Almighty "hands."

'and thou shalt fall into the hands of those that will be as 'eager to shed thine: the words imply more than they 'express.' (Lowth.) The blood of the Israelites, shed from hatred of God and his people, is especially meant.

V. 7, 8. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9. Cities, &c. The cities of Judah and Israel at that time lay desolate; but they were about to be rebuilded and replenished; the flourishing cities of Edom, on the contrary, would speedily be destroyed, and never return to their former condition. (Mal. i. 3, 4.) The Nabatheans, having driven the Edomites out of their ancient habitations, in the time of the Babylonish captivity, they settled themselves in the southern part of Judea, where they were afterwards conquered by Hyrcanus, and obliged to embrace the Jewish religion, and so became at length incorporated with that nation. (Prideaux.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10. The Edomites expected to get possession of the countries both of the Israelites and Jews, as living in the neighbourhood, or as allies for some time of the Chaldeans: and perhaps they were encouraged by some vague tradition concerning that land having been promised to the posterity of Abraham and Isaac; and concerning Esau, the elder brother having been supplanted by Jacob. This expectation seems to have excited their ardour in seeking the ruin of the Jews and in rejoicing over it. But the Lord, the Proprietor of the land, had dwelt there, in his temple, and by his ark and visible glory: he had given abundant proofs of his power, in putting the descendants of Jacob in possession of it and maintaining them in it: and though he had now for their sins given them into the hands of the Chaldeans: yet he reserved that holy land for their posterity, and the Edomites would not be able to deprive them of it.

V. 11. 'I will make my people see, that I have 'not quite cast them off, by avenging their quarrel upon 'thee.' (Lowth.)

V. 12, 13. The Edomites not only coveted the fertile inheritance of Israel, and entertained a family and national antipathy against them: but they also hated and despised them because of their relation to JEHOVAH. When they therefore saw the land desolated, and the people destroyed or carried captive, they reviled the mountains of Israel, and thus blasphemed God, as if he had been unable to keep possession; and they boasted and gloried, as if the God of Israel had been overcome, as well as the nation of Israel.

V. 14. 'When I shall restore other nations, con-'quered by the king of Babylon, to their former prospe-'rity, thou shalt still lie waste and desolate. The Edomites 'never recovered their country, after the Nabatheans had 'expelled them.' (Lowth.) Perhaps the land of Israel is meant. When the whole land of Israel should rejoice, as being replenished, the land of Edom would be rendered desolate.

V. 15. Idumea. Or Edom, as it is in the Hebrew.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is of fatal consequence for parents to teach their children resentments or enmity against others; and still more so to instil into them prejudices against the Church of God: for these seeds will spring up and yield most pernicious fruit, after they have gone down to the grave. The wrath of God is loudly proclaimed against those, that have perpetual hatred to his people; and who take advantage of their calamities to insult over them and oppress them. They who do not hate blood, may be induced to shed it in ambitious wars and cruel persecutions, or by suitable temptations; and then blood will pursue them, or even a more dreadful punishment. The Lord himself will punish the crimes of ungodly professors of his holy religion, and chastise his offending children: but he will let his enemies know that he dwells in his Church, notwithstanding all her sins and sufferings: and when they think to gratify their malice, envy, or avarice, by oppressing and spoiling his worshippers, he will cease to afflict them, and make his

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXVI. V. 1. The whole land was at this time uninhabited: but the Lord had a peculiar favour to it; and the prophet was ordered to address himself to the mountains of Israel, as the most conspicuous parts of the land. This might be meant as a reproof to such as refused to hear his word: but it was a great encouragement to those who regarded it, and assured them that God had mercy in reserve for them.

V. 2. 'The Idumeans made their boasts, that they 'should soon become masters of the mountainous parts 'of Judea, where the ancient fortresses were placed, 'which commanded all the rest of the country. To the same 'sense, we are to understand the expression of "riding on "the high places of the earth;" (Deut. xxxii. 13.) 'that 'is, taking possession of the fortresses or passes which com-'mand the rest of the country.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. The vain talkers among the heathen derided the pretensions of Israel, concerning a divine and exclusive right to the land of Canaan; as well as the language of the sacred writers, in calling it the glory of all lands, and the Lord's holy mountain. Whereas it now lay desolate, uncultivated, profaned, and seized upon by idolaters. Nor did JEHOVAH interfere to make good his claim, in behalf of his people: and they therefore thought that it might more properly be called an infamous than a glorious land.

V. 5. Surely, &c. This expression seems equivalent to the more general form, by which the Lord sware by himself, "As I live," &c. In burning jealousy for the honour of his name, which had been thus insulted by his enemies, he had spoken against them, and determined to put them to shame and to take vengeance on them; especially on the Edomites, who considered the land of Israel already their own possession; and who rejoiced exceedingly over the sufferings of the Jews, both from covetousness, and the malice and enmity of their despiteful hearts: and they aided the Chaldeans to cast them out, that the land might be a prey unto them. (7.)

V. 8. At hand, &c. The predicted seventy years of the captivity were wearing away; and the time would soon arrive for the Jews to repossess and cultivate their own land, and to eat the fruits of it. 'If we suppose the 'words to relate to the general restoration of the nation:

9 For, behold, [b] I am for you, and I will turn unto you, and ye shall be tilled and sown:

10 And [d] I will multiply men upon you, all the house of Israel, even all of it: and the cities shall be inhabited, and [e] the wastes shall be builded:

11 And I will multiply upon you man and beast; and they shall increase and bring fruit: [f] and I will settle you after your old estates, and [g] will do better unto you than at your beginnings: [h] and ye shall know that I am the LORD.

12 Yea, I will cause men to walk upon you, even my people Israel; and [i] they shall possess thee, and thou shalt be their inheritance, and thou shalt [k] no more henceforth bereave them of men.

13 Thus saith the Lord GOD; Because they say unto you, Thou land devourest up men, and hast bereaved thy nations;

14 Therefore thou shalt devour men [l] no more, neither * bereave thy nations any more, saith the Lord GOD.

15 Neither will I [m] cause men to hear in thee the shame of the heathen any more, neither shalt thou bear the reproach of the people any more, neither shalt thou cause thy nations to fall any more, saith the Lord GOD.

16 ¶ Moreover the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

17 Son of man, when the house of Israel dwelt in their own land, [n] they defiled it by their own way and by their doings: their way was before me [o] as the uncleanness of a removed woman.

18 Wherefore [p] I poured my fury upon them, [q] for the blood that they had shed upon the land, and for their idols wherewith they had polluted it:

19 And [r] I scattered them among the heathen, and they were dispersed through the countries: [s] according to their way, and according to their doings, I judged them.

20 And when they entered unto the heathen, whither they went, [t] they profaned my holy name, when they said to them, [u] These are the people of the LORD, and are gone forth out of his land.

21 But [x] I had pity for mine holy name which the house of Israel had profaned among the heathen, whither they went.

22 Therefore say unto the house of Israel, Thus saith the Lord GOD, [y] I do not this for your sakes, O house of Israel, but for mine holy name's sake, which ye have profaned among the heathen whither ye went.

23 And I will [z] sanctify my great name which was profaned among the heathen, which ye have profaned in the midst of them; [a] and the heathen shall know that I am the LORD, saith the Lord GOD,

'the longest distance of time, that the things of this 'world can extend to, is but a moment compared with 'eternity.' (Lowth.)

V. 10. The mercy, here promised, would be shown to Israel, in the most comprehensive sense, and not to Judah exclusively.

V. 11. Do better, &c. The outward state of the Jews was never so prosperous after the captivity, as it had been before that catastrophe: we must therefore understand this of their preservation from idolatry, and their adherence to the worship of God; and especially of the coming of the promised Saviour. Many interpreters think, that these predictions refer also to a future return of the Jews to their own land, when converted to Christ: and then indeed the Lord will do better unto them and their land, than at their beginnings.

V. 13—15. The Canaanites had been extirpated by Israel; and Israel had been destroyed or driven out by the Assyrians and Chaldeans, and by sword, famine, and pestilence: the heathen, therefore, who probably were pleased to find a seeming contrariety between the Jewish Scriptures and these facts, represented the good land as unwholesome, unfruitful, and destructive of its inhabitants: yet they were ready to take possession of it for themselves! But the Lord declared that he would replenish the land, and not suffer it any more to be desolated, as it had been during the Babylonish captivity; and that he would not any more give the heathen occasion thus to reproach it. Though the whole land of Israel was not desolated after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, as it had been after that by the Chaldeans: yet the slaughter made among the Jews was far greater; and they were entirely driven out of the land, and have continued in a state of exile from it for above seventeen hundred years. It seems therefore unavoidable, but that we must refer the full completion of this prophecy to some future event: when the land shall again become fruitful, and be inhabited by the nation of Israel to the end of time.

V. 17. 'A person, under a legal pollution, was for-'bidden to come within the courts of the temple, or at-'tend upon God's worship there: so the defilements the 'Jews had contracted by their idolatries, and other heinous 'sins, rendered them unqualified to be his people, or to of-'fer up any religious service to him.' (Lowth.)

[b] when I shall be sanctified in you before * their eyes.

24 For [c] I will take you from among the heathen, and gather you out of all countries, and will bring you into your own land.

25 Then [d] will I sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean: [e] from all your filthiness, and [f] from all your idols, will I cleanse you.

26 A [g] new heart also will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you: and I will take away [h] the stony heart out of your flesh, and I will give you an heart of flesh.

27 And [i] I will put my Spirit within you, and [k] cause you to walk in my statutes, and ye shall keep my judgments, and do them.

28 And [l] ye shall dwell in the land that I gave to your fathers; [m] and ye shall be my people, and I will be your GOD.

29 I will also [n] save you from all your uncleannesses: and I will [o] call for the corn, and will increase it, and lay no famine upon you.

30 And I will multiply the fruit of the tree, and the increase of the field, that ye shall receive no more [p] reproach of famine among the heathen.
